Campaign promotes Israeli-made products

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Walter Seaton would like the Jewish community to change its buying patterns.

By purchasing Israeli-made products whenever and wherever possible, Seaton believes that the community could support Israel in very real terms.

A retired engineer and international vice-president of worldwide engineering contracting companies, Seaton currently works as an arbitrator and mediator. Drawing on his marketing background, he has taken on the challenge of developing a plan for promoting Israeli-products.

With the support of many Jewish organizations, Seaton is working on a campaign encouraging the Jews of North America to seek out and purchase Israeli goods.

Seaton, who is on the board of Holy Blossom Temple and chairs the temple's Gmilut HaChassadim Committee, said that this is an interdenominational project which involves the entire community.

"Every day we buy furnishings, groceries, personal care items and wines. We all have our own ways of choosing the products we bring home and it is rarely based on country of origin."

Price-motivated consumers should consider buying Israeli products first, even if it means paying a little more, Seaton said.

"The difference in cost is a small price to pay to provide tangible economic support for Israel," he added.

Changing people's purchasing habits means convincing buyers to look for Israeli-made products instead of goods from other countries.

The goal is to encourage shoppers to stop and think before making their purchases, Seaton explained.

Goal is to encourage shoppers to stop and think before making purchase

As an example, when reaching for a product like canned peaches in the grocery aisle, Seaton is hoping consumers will consider going down the kosher aisle to look for the Israeli-canned fruit.

Israeli wines are available in many liquor stores, he added. But they're often not shelved separately as Israeli wines.

On occasion it might be necessary for shoppers to ask for the Israeli products in order to find them, he noted.

In terms of promotion, the difficult task for Seaton is trying to find the goods so that he can then bring them to the consumer's attention.

Many items don't have made in Israel tags, so it is difficult to know where the products come from.

Some linens may be made with Israeli fabrics, Seaton explained, but the tag might say "made in Mexico."

Seaton would like to be able to publish lists of Israeli products and locations where they are available.

"The challenge is finding as many wholesalers, importers and distributors as possible so that we can bring their products to the attention of the consumer."

Not all of us can show our support by going to Israel or investing heavily, Seaton said. But we can all buy Israeli-made products.

Temple Sinai's new cantor plans singing congregation

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The first time Cantor Tzvi Taub, the new cantor and music director of Temple Sinai, attended a service at the temple he was enthralled.

"There was a fine balance between the cantor and the congregants. I had a real sense of it being a service rather than a concert where the cantor performs a solo," he says.

As a cantor, "I love being on the bimah. I can sing without feeling as though I am giving a performance, without concern for my personal ego.

"I can let go and be immersed in the culture and heritage. I can express myself with artistry in a somewhat sheltered environment."

Taub, 42, originally from Israel, studied chazzanut at Bar-Ilan University. "My grandfather was a part-time cantor in Hungary, and I always grew up with a love of singing. At age 14, I performed a solo in the Mann Auditorium in Tel Aviv.

Cantor Tzvi Taub

He has served at Temple Ramat Zion, Northridge, Calif. and at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue in Winnipeg, and has been guest cantor at synagogues across North America, including Toronto's Adath Israel and Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am. He is an examiner with the Royal Conservatory of Music, and has appeared in operas and oratorio across North and South America.

Among the synagogues in which he has sung, he says, Temple Sinai falls in the "middle of the road. There is a general movement in the Reform movement towards tradition and I embrace that. It makes me more comfortable," says Taub, who describes himself as Conservadox.

"I am energized and inspired by the congregation's new approach, fresh attitudes, and openness towards new texts. This is a philosophy that is much needed in Jewish life. I am infused by my opportunity here."

As the differences between Reform and Conservative Judaism "become semantics, the two streams could probably unite."

The temple has high musical standards, he says, "and I hope to maintain and build on them. I hope to experiment with musical styles so as to satisfy many different tastes, but at the same time keep the traditions that are integral.

"I would like to emancipate the many directions of musical stylings, but keep the integrity and quality. I define [a service] as the relationship between inspiration, participation, musical tradition and sound, as well as the new emerging styles."

Music is present in all of our lives, "whether we want it or not. The music in our speech characterizes us beyond the logical message of speech, but that is stark, limited music," he says.

"Our tradition has evolved to carry a large heritage of chants in many modes with extensive development throughout the ages.

"Today, we have the best of both worlds. We have the unique old world of chanting with its noble sound, as well as the western tradition of music with its rich devices.

"Add to that the last century of Israeli song, and we have quite a substantial body of material to inspire us."

Taub plans on continuing the temple's Musical Legacy Series, developing the choirs, and enriching the musical programs.

For those who do not want to make a full-time choir commitment, he plans program choirs, in which participants will come together and practise for a specific event.

"I also intend to offer a voice development class for adults and youth so they will learn to feel at ease singing from the bimah. I want congregants to become lay cantors; I want a singing congregation."

The world has changed

By JEFF ROSEN
News & Internet Editor

Opinion

In a few moments the world changed. I'm sure this is beginning to sound like a cliché. It has been repeated ad nauseam by friends, relatives as well as the media.

However, whether you have realized it or not, it is the truth. Just a week ago, my wife and I were walking around the Queen's Quay area when I noticed a sign that forced me to stop in my tracks and ponder life.

There, across the street from the Toronto Star was the World Trade Centre, a condominium development. I've probably seen and passed the building many times in the past.

However, this time was different. I don't think I will ever look at that building and the name attached to it without thinking of its counterpart in New York.

Even before coming across Toronto's WTC, I found myself looking at Toronto's majestic skyline. I could not help but think of what had occurred in New York and wondered if such a horrific occurrence could take place in our own city.

If madmen could penetrate the heart of America's military at the Pentagon and take down such a key economic symbol as the World Trade Center, what would prevent them from setting their sights on such landmarks as the CN Tower, the Royal York or the city's many bank buildings. I fear they would all be easy targets to take out.

Even worse, a future attack could be aimed not at a country's national symbols, but directly at its people. Once launched, how could any government, any country deal with a biological attack.

Since this whole episode began, I have been disgusted by how revisionists have turned this whole "drama" around. Instead of America being the victim, some are saying that the United States got what it deserved for oppressing people around the world and supporting Israel.

I'm not going to get into geo-political issues at this point, since I don't know enough about American politics to profess to be an "expert." However, even if the U.S. is guilty of oppressing others, there can be no justification on earth for murdering, assassinating innocent citizens of not only that nation, but many others as well.

As we celebrate the festival of Sukkot and then rejoice in the completion of another year of reading the Torah, I pray that sanity will prevail around the world. Our leaders must ensure that justice is done while making certain that more innocent civilians are not killed.

At the same time, people everywhere must remember that no one religious group should be blamed. This is not a war between religions. Rather, it is a war between civilized people everywhere and terrorists – those who have no regard for the value of human life.

We as Jews should help spread that message loudly for it was not too long ago – in Germany – that our people were held responsible for that country's problems. Look at how that ended up.

Shalom.

New rabbi follows in her father's footsteps

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although Rabbi Debra Landsberg has just arrived in the city to take up her new position, she grew up at Temple Emanu-El.

Her father, Rabbi Alfred Landsberg, is spiritual leader of Temple Emanu-El in Edison, N.J.

"I spent most of my growing up in that synagogue; it was my second home. It has always been a natural environment," says Rabbi Landsberg who has been senior rabbi at Toronto's Temple Emanu-El since the beginning of August.

Becoming a rabbi is something "that has always been there for me. At 10 years old I formed an interfaith discussion group with a Methodist friend."

After Rabbi Landsberg graduated from Harvard, she worked at a psychiatric hospital for three years. "I wanted to make my final decision to become a rabbi as an adult.

"I loved that job at the hospital, but I did not like the separation between religious issues and life issues."

When she spent her first year at HUC in Jerusalem – she was ordained from Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in New York – "that settled it. Being there with serious liberal Jews settled any doubts I may have had about becoming a rabbi rather than being a committed Jew [and having a day job].

"In rabbinic school I worked as a counsellor for people with AIDS, and I found it striking how people wanted and needed to discuss issues such as the meaning of life and afterlife. They could discuss these things with me because I sat there as a rabbi.

"That brought together what I was doing. It made me aware of the blessing and responsibility of being a rabbi."

Toronto's Jewish community has a reputation south of the border, says Rabbi Landsberg, who spent five years as associate rabbi at The Temple in Atlanta, Ga. Established in 1867, it was the first Jewish congregation in Atlanta.

"Toronto is known for its commitment, its observance and its learning. It is a strong community with a strong infrastructure."

Temple Emanu-El, which has a membership of about 360 families, attracted her, she says, "because I believe in an intimate synagogue where the level of commitment is high.

"There is an enormous amount of lay leadership and a large number of synagogue activities. For a rabbi, that is very appealing."

She was "pleasantly surprised that having a woman rabbi was not significant at the temple. The harder issue was looking at any new rabbi, because Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld was here for many years. This is an enormous change."

As a progressive Jew, she says, she respects the differences between movements and she appreciates praying in different shuls. "When I went to school, being a woman was a non-issue. That is the big divide between Reform and other movements. I appreciate the way gender is not of religious significance."

One of the passions of Judaism, she says, is to strive to improve the world, "and that is fundamental to this congregation's identity."

While in Atlanta she worked on a social justice project that brought together learning and activities. "We had found that people were committed to social justice but they did not have a deeper understanding of the issues, so we would study with experts in different fields who would provide Jewish learning.

Rabbi Debra Landsberg

"One expert, for example, talked about death penalty issues and we discussed what Judaism had to say about it. I would like to see something like that brought in here."

She has met with Temple Emanu-El's social justice committee "who knows the community, and we'll figure out together what projects would be good for us. Meanwhile my job is to get to know the congregants and have them get to know me so we can establish a trust.

"It's exciting. I'll have to work hard, and that's the way it should be," said Rabbi Landsberg.

ORT honours educators

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Two women who are prominent in the field of education were honoured recently at Toronto ORT's annual Golden Circle Luncheon.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning and Karen Friedman, principal of Claude Watson School for the Arts with the Toronto District School Board were credited for their dedication to the field of education.

In her introduction of Rabbi Goldstein, Kathleen Crook, ORT Canada president and vice-president of World ORT, noted that under the guidance of Rabbi Goldstein, Kolel has provided in-depth Judaic studies since its inception to hundreds of adults in Toronto and across Canada.

Rabbi Goldstein, who served as assistant rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple and is the first woman to be elected president of the interdenominational Toronto Board of Rabbis, thanked ORT for the recognition of the centrality and ultimate importance of education.

Kolel has challenged the conventional wisdom "that if our children get engaged in Judaism, the adults will follow," Rabbi Goldstein said. Kolel has asked the community to "think outside the box" and try the theory that if adults fall in love with Judaism, their children will follow.

"Ten years and a thousand students later, I am still convinced that we are right. The next Jewish renaissance will be in Jewish education."

Gordon Wolfe, director of Jewish Family and Child Services introduced honoree, Karen Friedman. He noted that 25 years ago, he recognized that Friedman, then a counsellor at a children's summer camp operated by Wolfe and his wife, "was a special person who not only loved kids but demonstrated a profound understanding of the needs of children."

In his introduction he noted that Friedman served as assistant director of the Leo Baeck Day School, principal of Rockford Public School and is an instructor at York University for the principal's qualification course.

Friedman's "educational journey," was presented through a series of postcards dating back to 1961 when she was 10 years old in Grade 5. With humour and creativity, she reflected on her early school days – describing herself as a talkative, uninterested student who spent time in the chair outside the principal's office.

Crediting her Grade 6 teacher, Mrs. Miskin with her change in attitude, she said the teacher complimented her saying, "I am good at figuring out what poems and stories mean.

"This shifted the boundaries of my life in an irrevocable way."

This taught her that "Mrs. Miskin didn't tell me what to think, Mrs. Miskin teaches me how to think."

She has carried this lesson throughout her career in education. She says she came to understand that "there are no unreachable children, only those who are as yet unreached."

Held at the home of Edward and Marsha Bronfman, the ORT event was co-chaired by Ruth Druxerman and Helen Marr. Honorary patrons were Leslie and Anna Dan.

ORT is a non-profit, non-political organization that educates more than 300,000 students throughout its network of more than 800 schools, programs and training centres located in some 60 countries.

Two years ago, Toronto ORT introduced ORT's Technology and Study Skills Program for underprivileged children. The funds raised at the Golden Circle Luncheon support ORT schools in Israel and the local Technology and Study Skills Program.

Consul General of Israel to Toronto, Meir Romem credited ORT for its "very important role" in the education system in Israel.

"After the message of peace," he said, "I think the most important message is the message of education."

Among the other participants in the program were Andrea Dan Hytman, Marci Ullman, a mentor in the Technology and Study Skills Program, and Toronto ORT presidents, Renee Bleeman Bernbaum and Peter Kellner.

ישראל ובית המשפט הבינלאומי לפשעים(ICC)

" אחוד ברק לא צריך היה לאשרר את בית המשפט הזה- הוא אולץ לעשות כך על ידי האמריקאים. האו"ם ידוע בשטאתו העוורת לישראל וברוב האוטומאטי שזוכות בו מדינות מוסלמיות ושאר שונאי ישראל. בשנתיים האחרונות העביר האו"ם יותר ממאה החלטות אנטי ישראליות בעניין כיבוש עם זר וגזענות. ואז באה החלטה 1322 שבה קבעה ועדת זכויות האדם של האו"ם שישראל היא מדינה גזענית שרוצחת בשיטתיות אזרחים פלשתינאים. במלחמת השחרור, שבה ניסו הפלשתינאים להשמיד את היישוב היהודי, נמלטו 750,000 פלשתינאים, שצמחו עכשיו לארבעה מיליון. על פי החלטת האו"ם 194, יש לערבים האלה זכות שיבה. זה אומר שהתנגדותה של ישראל להחזירם תתפרש כ"טיהור אתני".

Hadassah-WIZO chapter celebrates 50 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The chapter – there are about 15 original members and the youngest member is 70 years old – still meets regularly and is still involved in the organization's annual bazaar.

They recently held their fifth annual fund-raising concert featuring flutist Claire Chapman and pianist Tamas Erdi, students at the Glenn Gould Professional School, the Royal Conservatory of Music.

The purpose of the concert is to promote young Canadian musicians and aid Hadassah-WIZO's Youth Aliyah program in Israel.

Part of what contributed to Aviva's staying power, says Shulman, was the success of their annual art show, which they ran for 45 years until the mid-1990s.

"It was a social event in the city and we raised close to $1 million over the years; the first show, held at Community House on St. George St. netted $1,495," she says.

When they started the chapter, says Cass, who joined at the third meeting, "community work was the thing to do; all our parents had been involved. If they had more, they would take care of someone who had less. My mother started the first tag day [to raise money] for the children's hospital in Brandon, [Man.].

"Our parents were models for us, and we have been models for our children. About 25 years ago, we started B'not Aviva, and it is also going strong."

The chapter was always a family affair, says Shulman. "Our husbands and children would come to the bazaar, and they all worked at the art show, picking up paintings and hanging them."

The chapter shaped the women's lives, she says. "To this day we hug if we have not seen each other for a while."

Shulman credits the organization with keeping her young. "I have a theory about aging. If you keep alert, keep busy, and keep involved, you keep young."

Montreal Jews, Muslims continue to talk

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Away from the spotlight, a small group of Jews and Muslims are meeting regularly to try to understand each other's religion.

For the past three years, Muslim-Jewish Dialogue of Montreal – comprised of both laypeople and clergy – has met every six or seven weeks in the offices of Canadian Jewish Congress. Participants have scrupulously avoided politics and focused on learning the basic beliefs and traditions of Judaism and Islam.

The tragic events in New York, however, have taken this friendly contact to a new level. Its leaders feel there should be no animosity or suspicion between Jewish and Muslim Montrealers.

"I would not hesitate at all to say that Islam is a religion of peace," says Edward Wolkove, the group's co-president along with Bashir Hussain.

"What happened in the United States has not changed our relationship with the Jewish community," says Hussain. Wolkove agrees.

Both accountants, Wolkove and Hussain believe in a practical approach. People of good will should do what they can to reach out and get to know their neighbours, they say.

"Ignorance breeds prejudice and hatred," Wolkove says.

Hussain noted that there may not be longstanding formal ties between the two communities in Montreal, but there have been good individual relations.

He recalls that a Jewish man, Harry Engels, helped the fledgling Muslim community get a permit to build its first mosque 30 years ago in St. Laurent. Today, the two communities are roughly the same size, about 95,000 people.

Wolkove and Hussain, who was born in Pakistan, are also members of the Montreal Interfaith Council, which brings together representatives of nearly all religions in the city.

Immediately after the terrorist attacks, the Muslim-Jewish Dialogue issued the first public statement in its history, saying that they "deplore and condemn" the acts, and adding that "Islam is a religion of peace and not a religion of violence.

"To the families of the men, women and children who perished in this tragic and horrendous way, we extend our deepest and heartfelt condolences. To all who have been injured in these infamous acts, we pray for a complete and speedy recovery."

The words may seem restrained, but Wolkove says it should be remembered that any joint action by Jews and Muslims in Montreal is a major step forward.

Christian-Jewish dialogue, on the other hand, has grown into a full and open exchange over the past several decades, Wolkove, a veteran in the field, says.

"We are just feeling our way around Muslim-Jewish dialogue," he says. "I don't know if in my lifetime I'll see it develop into the kind of relationship that we have with Christians."

The Muslim-Jewish Dialogue was founded at the urging of former Israeli consul general in Montreal, Daniel Gal. Gal, who had been invited to speak to Christian-Jewish Dialogue about the Mideast conflict, suggested to Wolkove that he begin similar communication with Muslims. Wolkove called his friend Hussain, who agreed to give it a try.

Hussain sees Muslims and Jews as both children of Abraham, and respects Judaism as the predecessor of Islam. He appreciates the fact that Muslims, who fear they are being stereotyped because of the terrorism of a few, can turn to the Jewish community for support today.

The meetings, by invitation only, usually attract 15 to 20 people, mostly laymen and including several academics, among them Barry Levy, dean of the faculty of religious studies at McGill University, and Concordia University Jewish studies professor Ira Robinson.

Wolkove says most of the Muslims are of Pakistani origin, and a few are Egyptian. Because the focus is on theology, he says, he is not concerned that more Arab Muslims have not shown an interest.

Getting rabbis interested has also not been easy, he admits. Reform Rabbi Leigh Lerner has been a regular attendee and Conservative Rabbi Allan Langner, who has had a longtime interest in interfaith dialogue, is also involved.

Yet, he says, "There has been difficulty getting the Orthodox. The rabbis are very busy."

Meetings typically focus on aspects of the Koran or Hebrew Bible. Participants learn about each other's festivals and customs and get a grounding in the different branchs of Judaism and Islam.

Wolkove and Hussain say that things will remain that way when the group holds its next meeting this month.

Interactive sessions planned in Vancouver

VANCOUVER — Two Canadian women hoping to make a difference in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terror attacks in the United States are launching a workshop entitled: Your Wake-up Call to Repair the World.

Their interactive sessions are designed to address feelings of despair and powerlessness people may be feeling after the horrific attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Vancouver resident Joni Mar, a professional coach and speaker, has joined Wendy Schneider, a leadership development professional at UJA Federation of Hamilton and the editor of Hamilton Jewish News, to offer the workshop, which they hope will attract Vancouverites of varying faiths and backgrounds.

Both are members of ethnic/cultural minority groups: Mar is Chinese-Canadian and Schneider is Jewish. Schneider is flying to Vancouver specifically to work with Mar.

The pair seek to build bridges between groups and feel they can help those who are feeling overwhelmed and helpless because of the Sept. 11 attacks.

"I feel hugely committed to getting the word out that individuals really can make a difference and that our collective acts of kindness do impact on the world," Schneider said.

"If we begin by reaching out and serving those in our own communities, I truly believe there will be a ripple effect out in the world."

The workshop seeks to inspire participants to take action and empower them to discover abilities they can use to serve the world.

The workshop will take place on Oct 11, from 6:30-9:30 p.m., at the Canadian Memorial Centre for Peace, Fireside Lounge, 1825 West 16th Avenue, Vancouver.

The price is $40. Bring a friend and get 2 admissions for $60.To register contact Joni Mar at 604-261-3809 or joni_mar@telus.net.

Hamilton UJA Federation gets new exec. director

By JULIA KOLLEK
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — Gerry Fisher has been Executive Director of Hamilton's UJA Federation for just a short time, and there's been little time to set up his office. His wife, Anna-Rae Fishman, has been drafted in to help. The family team spirit fits with the small-town life of which they are now a part, where you help out and are often involved in several organizations at the same time.

Although Fisher, 52, was born in Boston, he discovered his Judaism while living in an isolated community.

"It was 1973, the tail end of the hippie era, and I was living on a communal farm in Cape Breton," Fisher said, beckoning towards a group of comfortable armchairs in the JCC lounge.

"When the Yom Kippur war broke out that year, I started to read all I could about Israel, and that motivated me to learn more about the Jewish community, and how I could contribute to it," he said.

"So I went into Halifax, and took out the local phone book. I looked under 'j' for Jewish, and every organization you could think of was listed there. But then I noticed that they all had the same phone number.

"I found the one office, wanting to offer my help, and when I got there, I found one overburdened man. He was director of everything – the local CJC, the Halifax UIA, B'nai Brith... Not surprisingly, he looked really harassed and frantic.

"So then he asked me if I could drive to the airport. There was someone coming in to speak who needed picking up. And that's how I found myself taking the charismatic activist, Dennis Prager, who founded the powerful Student Struggle for Soviet Jewry, round to all the local groups. I was with Dennis for two days and five speeches.

"By the end, I'd decided to enrol for a master's in social work and community development at Dalhousie, and I chose to do field placement for the Jewish community in the Maritimes."

Part of Fisher's work took him on his first trip to Israel as a delegate to a Canadian Zionist Federation conference, another experience that had a profound effect on him and kindled his Zionism.

His first professional job offer after graduating, was – ironically – from Hamilton, where he was invited to run a Tweeners Program at the JCC. Fisher felt he lacked the Judaic knowledge, and while declining the job offer, he was prompted to take a course in Jewish communal service.

The big city then beckoned. Fisher moved to Toronto and worked at several high profile Jewish organizations, including as executive director of the B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation, National Director of Community Services for the Canada-Israel Committee. For more than 16 years, he was at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto in a range of roles, which encompassed community development, human resources and planning.

It was in Toronto that Fisher and Fishman met on a blind date set up by friends, and they married. Fishman grew up in Sault St. Marie, where both her grandfather and father were rabbis. When she met Fisher, she was running for the office of the attorney general for Ontario in her role as chief of staff.

They left Toronto when Fisher needed to return to the United States for family reasons. The couple moved to New Hampshire – a community similar in size to Hamilton – and he took up a post as executive director of the Jewish Federation of Greater Manchester.

"Our home there was in a forest... it was hard to leave when we made the move to Hamilton," Fisher said. "But we were homesick for Canada, where we both feel we belong, and when we moved here, it was important for us to live in the countryside. Jewish tradition teaches us to be in touch with nature. Rabbi Nachman of Breslov encouraged people to be close to nature as an important step in their spiritual development."

The conversation was interrupted briefly as a friendly community member presented a tray of homemade cupcakes. As he enjoyed a taste, the significance was not lost.

"One of the things I learned while in Nova Scotia was that small communities have a hard time recruiting serious professionals with serious aspirations, because those people gravitate towards big cities. My view is that every Jewish soul counts, not just the ones who live in Thornhill and Willowdale, but those in Fredericton and Dundas.

"There is a lot happening here in Hamilton, which is unusual for a Jewish community of this size, and it's worthy of admiration," Fisher said. "People here have been warm, welcoming and appreciative. Coming here posed a significant professional challenge for me. You can do important work. I want to strengthen the infrastructure here, energize the leadership, and set up a million dollar campaign.

"I'm looking forward to helping this community achieve its goals," Fisher said. "Success isn't about me, it's abqut people's abilities and willingness to accept the need for change, and to get out there and lead. We need to bring in the next generation.

"I'm committed to helping Hamilton grow."

Mock gets new post

Mock believes the recent terrorist attacks on New York and Washington, combined with the impact of the United Nations World Conference against Racism in Durban, South Africa that immediately preceded it, will "intensify the work that needs to be done ... it was a wake-up call for those who were skeptical about the connection between hate speech and terrorism and violence."

Despite her familiarity with the issues, Mock, who chaired the advisory committee on Canada's preparations for the conference, was as shocked as anyone by the events of Sept. 11.

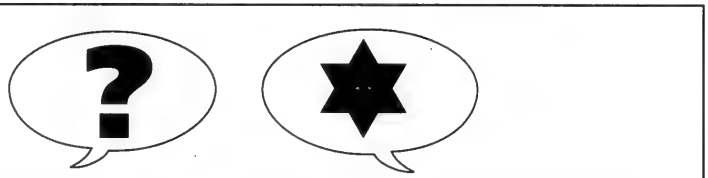
"I knew of the culture of hate and the teaching of hate that was going on in some extremist groups, but I don't think any of us imagined that there would be a planeload of people used as a suicide bomb. This had gone beyond imagination into the surreal."

One of the first things she did professionally following the attack was to reach out to beleaguered Muslim organizations in Canada and to state publicly that, no matter what, it isn't right to stereotype any group. "I think [the terrorism and the atmosphere at the Durban conference] show the importance of continuing the work of intercultural and interracial dialogue – real dialogue, not just lip service," she said.

However, she said, if there's "a group that's determined to kill you, I don't think that you sit down and dialogue. It has gone beyond that."

It was a shock and disappointment to her that even colleagues in non-governmental organizations can become "swept up in the impact of some of the propaganda, and the line between legitimate political discourse and racism/anti-Semitism became blurred."

Most immigrants, she added, have come here not to promote terrorism but to live a life free of persecution, as did her own eastern European grandparents.



CONVERSATIONS ABOUT CONVERSION

A special 6 week course for those who have converted to Judaism or those considering conversion. Explore the history and traditional texts on conversion, issues of acceptance, ethnicity, family and community, the myths around conversion, plus the lighter side of conversion.

Conference on Jewish radicalism held

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The ideals of social justice and egalitarianism which have been at the root of Jewish radical thought and action remain as relevant today as they were when they were first introduced, said organizers of the recent Jewish Heritage Society of Western Canada conference.

The conference, called Jewish Radicalism In Winnipeg 1905-1960 and held on Sept. 9 and 10, brought the old Jewish North End back to life for many. The first conference of its kind in Canada, it drew scholars and researchers from across the country.

Once, Winnipeg was known as the "Jerusalem of Canada." During the first half of the last century, the city's fabled North End was a hotbed of Jewish and Yiddish intellectual ferment and a breeding ground for radical politics. Jewish radicals – be they Socialists, Marxists, Labour-Zionists or Anarchists – became major players in the community, establishing political parties, Yiddish schools, newspapers and cultural organizations, all reflecting their particular ideologies and visions.

The conference's keynote address was delivered by Leo Panitch, distinguished research professor at York University. He discussed the four phases of socialism in the 20th century as well as his memories of growing up in Winnipeg in the latter part of the radicalism era.

Panitch described how when his father came to Winnipeg in 1922, at the age of 16, he was already a commited Labour-Zionist.

His mother and her sister came to Winnipeg as teenage orphans, he said. His mother was involved in organizations such as Hadassah; his aunt became a member of the Communist party through her work in the garment industry.

"There were constant political arguments over the dinner table between my dad and my aunt," Panitch recalled. "I found it a paradox though that my mother was less politically active than her sister but more involved in the community."

Panitch wondered why his father called Alter Cherniack a leftist because Cherniack's grandson didn't have a bar mitzvah. Cherniack was a central figure in the Peretz School.

"It was as natural for my father to work for the CCF and 'right winger' David Orlikow as it was eating herring and rye bread," Panitch said.

Panitch left Winnipeg at the age of 22 and never came back. His father visited him once in London where he was studying at the London School of Economics.

"I had a poster of Lenin on my wall," he recalled. "When my father saw the poster, his response was that Auntie Rose had won. I tried to explain that this was the kind of poster that leftists of my generation put on my walls. I was a product of the socialist hothouse that was London in the late 1960s."

Panitch pointed out Jewish radicalism was clearly in decline by the 1950s.

"The NDP were not really socialists," he said. "My father's socialism belonged to the past."

He recalled that in the 1970s, while teaching in Ottawa, he received a letter from his old Peretz School teacher Chaver Halper complimenting his former student on his Marxist theory as it applied to the Canadian state.

"I didn't know much about Winnipeg Jewish radical movements then," Panitch said. "I never gave any thought to my Peretz School teacher's political philosophy. It turned out Chaver Halper was a Marxist."

Despite the legacy of the radical tradition in Winnipeg, Panitch said, "Winnipeg's Jewish community has changed so completely it's doubtful it will ever regain its former socialist flavour. Individual Jews will still be involved but they will be involved as members as the society as a whole."

Panitch was one of several speakers to address the two-day conference. Others included professor and author Mildred Gutkin; her husband, historian Harry Gutkin and former Winnipegger Arthur Ross, a teacher at Ryerson University; McGill University professor Michael Greeenstein; D.I. Victer, former Peretz School president; Ruth Frager of McMaster University; and Roz Usiskin, president of the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada.

Observing leaders' crisis response

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

One can get a good sense of politicians by observing their responses to a crisis, and no one can doubt that Canada shares in the sense of crisis precipitated by the recent terrorist attacks in the USA.

Predictable carping aside, the Prime Minister performed in a manner perfectly consistent with his overall approach to politics. Guided by a sense of practicality, Chrétien offered public statements but only when necessary. He signalled his positions mostly in private discussions within Cabinet and with principal allies, and stepped in to calm tensions when they had the potential to harm domestic Canadian interests. That is characteristic of the PM's interventions on virtually every issue. If the political climate in Canada is relatively calm, albeit sombre, he deserves a fair bit of credit. Not so some of the opposition parties.

Stockwell Day has comported himself exceptionally well. He has been restrained – both in caucus and in public – and ensured that the focus remains on what we have to do as a country rather than seeking partisan advantage. Alas, he stands alone in this regard.

The New Democrats, again confirming their irrelevance, immediately accused the government of serving as toadies to the Americans. NDPer Pat Martin's rant in the House last week about "goose-stepping" in rhythm to every demand by Bush apparently had the NDP phone operators fielding more calls in a day than they usually get in a month.

But the performance that takes the cake has been that of Joe Clark. When every western-democratic government has gone to great lengths to present a unified front, Clark has been at his partisan shrillest – and nastiest. He has taken the government to task for lax immigration and defence policies – even though it was a Tory government that put those policies in place. Then, he whined about the prime Minister not keeping him in the 'loop' regarding the government's responses to the crisis, implying that the government was thereby compromising the vitality of public debate on the issues.

Of course, if Clark was brought into 'the know', he would be precluded from engaging in any public debate about those issues. So what this is really about was internal party politics. While no one was watching, he sent a sneaky directive to Tory House Leader Peter McKay concerning party status for the Chuck Strahl group. There has been some suggestion that the Tories may have wanted to sabotage the petition to get the group party status so that the Alliance rebels would finally be forced to choose between the Tories and the Alliance. Certainly, there has been a palpable cooling between the rebels and their Tory suitors over the last few days.

A mischievous Liberal quipped that if the boss (a.k.a., Chrétien) was smart, he would brief Clark (thereby muzzling him) and give Strahl his party (thereby thwarting Clark's own Conservative version of High Noon).

Who knows ... maybe le petit gar de Shawinigan may yet call Clark's bluff.

Hamilton woman gets ambulance for Israel

By JULIA KOLLEK
Special to The CJN

HAMTILTON — When Hilda Rosen came home from synagogue last Yom Kippur, she called Israel. The news had been increasingly bad, and she wanted to check in with the JNF shaliach who had just gone home and taken a job in an area under attack.

"What can we do to help?" she asked. His reply was, "Send us an ambulance."

Rosen phoned her friend, Margaret Rethazy, who immediately gave a cheque for more than a third of the money needed, and in just four weeks, Rosen raised the $71,000 needed. An ambulance reading "With love from Hamilton" on its doors was on its way.

Recently, on the first anniversary of that phone conversation, a lunch to honour Rosen and all the sponsors was held in Shalom Village, Hamilton's seniors' residence.

Alex Serota, president of the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Magen David Adom, thanked those present, saying that with the current situation, Israel's 550 ambulances have been on call continuously, paramedics and doctors have risked being targets, and through increased use, more than 80 ambulances in the past year have worn out and need replacing.

A photo of the Hamilton ambulance was among the presentations. It will hang next to a previous ambulance Rosen helped to buy about 10 years ago when she was president of the Hamilton Supporters for Israel.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A major career fair for business, engineering and computer science students at the University of Western Ontario (UWO) was held last week on Yom Kippur from noon to 5 p.m.

Marc Chernoff, a final-year student in the Richard Ivey School of Business' Honours Business Administration (HBA) program, brought the scheduling problem to the attention of Rick Robertson, HBA program director, when he learned of it last month. Chernoff told The CJN he understood the date could not be changed because of the number of companies (more than 70) that were involved.

After other students approached Chernoff about the problem (because of his history of involvement in student government), he organized a petition and collected 150 signatures from both Jewish and non-Jewish students over a three-day period.

In the document addressed to Dean Larry Tapp of the Ivey School, Chernoff explained that students who are unable to attend because they are observing the holy day feel they "will be at a disadvantage to obtain a job. Since recruiters will be hiring fewer people this year, the more interaction students have with them, the better the chances are to be hired." Interim solutions were also suggested.

"Most importantly," Chernoff wrote, "with proper planning and considerations, these types of situations can be avoided in the future." He noted that an Outward Bound program that is part of the first-year HBA program was scheduled on Rosh Hashanah.

Chernoff sees the event as an anomaly, given its scope. More minor events do take place on Jewish holidays, he said in an interview.

An answering letter was sent to Ivey students on Sept. 20 by the Connected 2001 Career Fair Team, representing staff from the three faculties.

The letter apologized "that this unfortunate date conflict has occurred" and outlined steps the team would take in response to the problem:

- collecting resumes until Sept. 26 (the day before Yom Kippur) to be distributed to companies on behalf of students who could not attend;
- including an explanatory letter with the resumes;
- making available a copy of each company contact for the week following the career fair; and
- making available collateral material of each company at the career fair for the week following the event.

Chernoff, who noted that the Jewish High Holy Days are marked in the university's calendar, was impressed with the speedy response and the acceptance of his recommendations. His only regret is that there was no mention of ensuring the situation doesn't arise in the future, he said.

It won't, Ed Pearce, director of communications for the Ivey school, said, speaking in place of Tapp, who was out of town.

The campus has over 3,000 Jewish students, and Chernoff estimates that of the 420 HBA students, 10 to 20 percent are Jewish. But according to Pearce, only two submitted resumes because they couldn't attend the fair. One of them is not Jewish, but will be out of the country, he said.

Bernie Farber

Bernie Farber, executive director, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said he was told students are "somewhat reluctant to speak out because they don't want to incur the wrath of the administration... I'm not saying that is the case [but] that is the perception. In my discussions with administration I found them to be understanding. They acknowledged their error."

In fact, a University of Toronto student who spoke to The CJN about small-scale recruiting sessions on that campus on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, requested anonymity for fear of repercussions. In that case, half a dozen students were affected and alternate arrangements to meet with a company representative were made, the student said.

Farber became involved in the dialogue about the UWO career fair after receiving calls from a number of parents of affected students.

He said students "will feel compelled to choose between Yom Kippur and Career Fair. No student of any faith should be compelled to make that kind of choice. It's just not fair."

The resolution presented to the students doesn't entirely meet their needs, said Farber. "I just don't think students will call and say they're not coming. [Handing in a resume is] not the same as being able to speak to a company representative and present your qualifications in person."

Farber found the situation "quite remarkable," because apparently nobody among the organizers or the participating companies caught the mistake until it was too late to reschedule.

"The whole thing is quite baffling. I just don't understand how in this day and age, the holiest day of the Jewish calendar is not taken into account."

CJC regularly fields calls about exams being scheduled on the Sabbath or the first two days or last two days of Passover, said Farber. "I can't remember a time when we haven't been able to have it resolved."

A larger, university-wide career fair will be held at UWO on Jan. 31.

B'nai Brith protests 'Palestinian propaganda'

MONTREAL – B'nai Brith Canada has accused the Concordia Student Union (CSU) of "fanning the flames of hatred" for turning its 2001-2002 student calendar into an "aggressive, pro-Palestinian propaganda tool."

The 312-page booklet distributed by the CSU reprints a chant about the Intifadah – entitled "Uprising" – on its first page. It reads in part: "Out of your houses and into the streets/intifada/ hear the calls, the cries, the voices screaming, drums beating, pulse of your heart, body dancing/ intifada/take arms for revolution."

The calendar refers to May 15, the anniversary of the creation of the State of Israel, by the Arabic term Al-Nakba (catastrophe).

The publication also includes a column entitled "Arabophobia" that refers to university rector Frederick Lowy as the "Jewish rector" and talks about "Zionists controlling the North American media." It was written by CSU vice-president Laith Marouf, who was expelled by Concordia for allegedly writing anti-Israeli graffiti and threatening campus security staff.

Professor Stephen Scheinberg, national chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights and chair of Concordia's history department, said the material amounts to a "call to arms" and is especially troubling in light of the recent terror attacks in the United States.

Young, old face similar nutrition challenges

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

Nutritionists agree that children and adults face similar challenges when it comes to optimizing nutrition.

Both groups risk eating the wrong foods or not enough of the right foods, as certain dishes can be difficult to prepare or hard to chew and digest.

Often, the foods parents pack in their children's lunch box come packaged like toys, making them appealing to kids, "but it's important to restrict some of these processed foods because they can be nutrient poor and have additives," says Sharon Gottlieb, RD, author of Seeing the Light: Eat Well, Be Active, Feel Good About Yourself, Once and For All.

It is important that children eat the right foods – and the right amounts of food – because while they are growing, "kids these days have less opportunity to burn calories," says Gottlieb.

"Kids are more sedentary because of computers and the Internet. They're bused to school and they can't always play outside."

Obesity in children, she says, is increasing because of the accessibility of food and also because of inactivity.

Similarly, many seniors don't get the proper amount of calcium, produce or protein, such as that found in meat, because some of these foods may be hard to chew and digest, says Carol Robertson, RD, manager of clinical/patient food and nutrition services at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"Often seniors neglect dairy products," Robertson says, noting that the incidence of osteoporosis in both sexes is high, as one in four women and one in eight men have brittle bones.

Both Gottlieb and Robertson agree that the simple formula for healthy eating involves following Canada's food guide.

"Each meal should combine a grain product, fruit or vegetables and a source of protein," Gottlieb says.

She recommends making foods using ground beef or chicken, such as meat loaf or pasta with meat sauce because foods such as steak can be hard for children and seniors to chew.

When choosing fruits and vegetables, both nutritionists recommends eating the most brightly coloured ones, as these are the most nutrient-dense.

"Choose spinach over lettuce, apricots over pears, and if you have a problem with salt intake, fresh or frozen produce is better than canned," Robertson advises.

She does suggest cutting all visible fat off meat, having lower-fat diary products, such as one-percent milk and cheeses with less than 20 percent milk fat, and using vegetable oils or non-hydrogenated margarine instead of butter.

Gottlieb says that some higher-calorie, higher-fat foods can be good choices for children as well. These include cheese, peanut butter, pudding and homemade oatmeal cookies.

"Canned, unsweetened fruit, fresh fruit and vegetables and 100 percent fruit juice are good," says Gottlieb, cautioning that children shouldn't have too much juice because this can be a hidden source of extra calories.

"Parents can get their kids involved in packing lunches. Make choosing colourful veggies and fruit a game. Refer to these foods as treats, because children will feel deprived if they aren't given junk food," Gottlieb says.

In essence, it is important for both children and seniors to have nutrient-rich foods and avoid empty calories.

Here are some easy and nutritious recipes that both children and seniors can enjoy – and digest.

APPLE-CHEDDAR BREAD PUDDING

4 slices whole wheat enriched bread cut in squares
¼ cup raisins
2 apples, cored, coarsely chopped
¾ cup grated cheddar cheese
2 eggs
½ cup milk
¼ cup maple syrup
¼ tsp. cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Combine bread with raisins, apples and cheese. Put in a greased 9 x 5-inch glass loaf dish. Beat eggs with milk, syrup and cinnamon. Stir into bread mixture. Bake, uncovered, 40 minutes or until knife inserted in centre comes out clean. If top browns too quickly, cover loosely with foil. Serve warm. Serves 4.

Per serving: 330 calories; 13 g protein; 13 g fat; 43 g carbohydrate; 5 g fibre; 280 mg calcium.

CHILI CHICKEN BAKE

1 10-oz. can fiesta or home-style condensed tomato soup
1 green pepper, cubed
1 onion, thinly sliced
chili powder to taste
4 skinless boneless chicken half-breasts
2 tbsp. freshly chopped parsley or cilantro.

Preheat oven to 350. Combine condensed soup, vegetables and chili power (if using) in ovenproof dish. Place chicken on top. Baste a little sauce over chicken. Sprinkle with herbs. Bake 15-20 minutes. Refrigerate any leftovers without delay. Serves 4.

Per serving: 205 calories; 29 g protein; 3 g fat; 15 g carbohydrate.

It was taranka, not a shoe

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Those of us who remember the 1960s may recall the United Nations incident when Nikita Khrushchev hit the table several times with his shoe to get attention.

Well, according to legend, it wasn't really a shoe – it was a dried Russian fish. Specifically, taranka.

"There is a special procedure used to make taranka," Vadim Bychutsky said in an interview.

Beginning with a certain kind of whitefish, you have to lay down the fresh fish in a pot – side by side – and then salt them – a lot, says Bychutsky, who was born in St. Petersburg (Leningrad), Russia.

You repeat layering and salting the fish until you've used about 30 fish and 1 kilo of salt.

Then you refrigerate the pot for 3 days to a week. It has to remain moist, Vadim says, so be sure to add water.

After a week, take the fish from the pot and hang them up outside.

It's easiest to connect them by lacing a string through their eyes. But, they shouldn't be too close to each other – about 10 cm in between each one, Vadim adds.

"The only problem is that the fish attract flies like there's no tomorrow.

"The solution is to take surgical gauze – preferably not used – and wrap them completely.

"Sometimes this helps," Vadim says.

The next step is to let them hang out in the sun for about two weeks.

Check after two weeks; if they are still very bendable, then they are not done. They have to be almost dry.

"So, it's not that Khrushchev was being rude," Vadim notes. "He was just getting his taranka ready for a snack.

"By the way, real men don't eat taranka with any spices and they don't hold their noses. But it does go well with beer."

Britain criticized for diplomatic overture to Iran

By TIM PULMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Britain is being criticized for its diplomatic initiative aimed at wooing Iran into a U.S.-led coalition against terror.

Reacting to Foreign Minister Jack Straw's visit last week to Tehran, one U.S. analyst told British television that it had been "absurd" for Britain to court a "terrorist state."

Analysis

This view is strongly shared by Israel, which is fearful that the new anti-terrorist coalition would include virulently anti-Israeli countries.

Moreover, Israeli officials – including Prime Minister Ariel Sharon – were incensed after Straw was quoted last week by an Iranian newspaper as saying, "One of the factors which helps breed terrorism is the anger which many people in this region feel at events over the years in Palestine."

Sharon initially refused to meet last week with Straw, who visited Israel after travelling to Iran. The meeting was rescheduled after Sharon held a 15- minute telephone conversation with British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Straw's visit – during which, according to some reports, he may have carried a message for Iranian leaders from Washington – was the first made by a British foreign secretary to Iran since that nation's 1979 Islamic Revolution.

But it apparently backfired when, hours after Straw left Tehran, Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, launched a bitter attack on the American-led anti-terror coalition.

"We do not believe America is sincere enough to lead an international move against terrorism," Khamenei said Sept. 26.

"America has its hands deep in blood for all the crimes committed by the Zionist regime."

Khamenei spoke two days after U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said Iran should halt its support for terrorism if it wanted to be a part of the international anti-terror coalition.

The ayatollah made his comments to a crowd that had taken to the streets chanting "Death to America."

Speaking on British television Sept. 27, U.S. defence strategist Richard Perle said it was "absurd" to court Iran, which he described as a state sponsor of terrorism.

Iran is "part of the problem, not part of the solution," said Perle, who served as an assistant secretary of defence under former U.S. president Ronald Reagan.

"I don't know what Blair was trying to do," Perle added, implying that Straw's visit did not have Washington's blessing.

"I don't think there's anything Iran can do to help us," Perle said. "It's a grave mistake to compromise the moral high ground by inviting terrorists to join with us."

"I think it was mistake and it was responded to with contempt, which was only to be expected from the Iranian regime," he added.

Iran has long been accused of supporting various terror groups, including Hamas and Hezbollah, as well as anti-Egyptian Islamic militants.

Far from leading to moderation from Iran's leaders, Straw's visit appears only to have bolstered their hard line.

Reacting to U.S. President George W. Bush's position that all countries must be either with Washington or with the terrorists, the ayatollah said the most vicious terrorists were on America's side – a reference to American support of Israel.

Announcing that Iran is not with Washington, "nor are we with the terrorists," the ayatollah accused Washington of trying to spread its influence through Central Asia.

Moreover, Khamenei made it clear Iran would provide no help of any sort for an attack on Afghanistan.

The correspondent pointed out that even Iran's normally mild-mannered reformist president, Mohammad Khatami, made an uncharacteristic personal attack on the U.S. president, accusing Bush of "falling prey to the arrogance of power."

Britain has been eager to be seen as the main U.S. ally in the newly formed coalition, but its eagerness to draw in certain Arab states has raised the hackles of the Israeli leadership.

As far as Israel was concerned, the comments Straw made in the Iranian media appeared to indicate a shift in British policy.

Israeli officials were angry that the word "Palestine" was used, rather than the usual noncommittal reference to Palestinian territories. Also, Straw's words appeared to imply that Israel's policies were at least in part responsible for allowing terrorism to flourish.

While the Sharon-Straw meeting ultimately did take place, a state dinner that was to be hosted by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres did not occur.

While in Israel, Straw insisted that he understood the terrorist threat faced by Israel, adding that he had strongly opposed terror groups that operated from British soil.

Also straining Israeli-British relations, Britain's Guardian newspaper quoted an unnamed official in Britain's Foreign Office as calling Sharon "the cancer at the centre of the Middle East crisis."

Officials from the Foreign Office later denied that this remark reflected official British sentiment, but the damage had already been done.

In London, the ruling Labour Party's Friends of Israel group – which includes a number of members of Parliament – called for an urgent meeting with Straw over the "shift of policy" toward Israel.

A spokesman for the group complained that "it seems Arabists are in full control of the Foreign Office."

There has traditionally been a pro-Arab slant at the Foreign Office ever since British rule in Palestine ended in 1948.

Successive British prime ministers have taken a more pro-Israeli line than the Foreign Office has recommended.

Meanwhile, Straw's controversial comment is having responses from British Jewish leaders as well.

Last Friday, the vice chairman of Labour Friends of Israel, Jon Mendelsohn, criticized Straw for "bad policy" and insisted that it reflected "Foreign Office attitudes not shared by Mr. Blair."

Mendelsohn used to be an aide to Blair.

In another development, the Board of Deputies, the umbrella organization that represents most British Jews, sent a letter to Straw complaining that his remarks had given "credence to anti-Israel and anti-Jewish propaganda."

Jo Wagerman, the board's president, wrote: "It is difficult for me to underline sufficiently the damaging consequences of such statements within the context of British Jewry."

Arafat condemned for allowing exhibit honouring suicide attack

By TIM PULMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — An order by Yasser Arafat to close a Palestinian university exhibit re-enacting a terrorist attack on Israel is being seen by observers as "too little, too late."

The president of the Palestinian Authority (PA) bowed to pressure on Tuesday of last week to order the closure of the Al Najah University exhibit, which celebrates the August suicide bombing at the Sbarro Pizzeria in Jerusalem that killed 15 people, including two Americans.

A student faction of the radical Islamic group Hamas – which created the exhibit – had earlier altered it slightly on orders from PA leaders, The New York Times reported.

Arafat's delayed response was condemned by Rabbi Marvin Hier, head of the Los-Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center, as "outrageously too little, too late."

Speaking from Jerusalem, where he was spending the High Holy Days, Hier said: "This is the goading of the victims of the terror attack. It was saying, 'You are crying, we are laughing.'"

Hier complained that Arafat had initially failed to respond to protests over the exhibition, which opened on Sunday of last week at the Nablus university in the West Bank.

Hier called on the United States government to officially protest the opening of the exhibition. "At a time when... the whole world is joining [U.S. President George W. Bush] in a united effort to fight international terrorism and when Arafat wants to be a part of that international coalition, a university under [Arafat's] control is paying homage to suicide bombers and terrorists.

"American citizens were killed in that attack in Jerusalem, and the United States owes it to them, and to other victims, to vigorously condemn this outrage. This is also a time for Muslim leaders in America to speak out and condemn this obscene act."

In one room of the exhibition, students dressed as suicide bombers, clasping a Koran in one hand and a gun in the other, conduct what is intended to be their final interview before setting out on their suicide mission.

Another student, dressed in a military uniform and face mask, is featured setting a supposed bomb. This scene takes place at a replica of a restaurant with the word "kosher" written in Hebrew above the door. Sbarro was a popular kosher restaurant frequented by Israelis.

According to Hier, the exhibit also includes a large rock with a figure behind it wearing a black hat, black trousers and jacket with a recording inside the rock calling out, "O believer, there is a Jewish man behind me, come and kill him." The exhibit also pays tribute to three leaders of the terrorist group Hamas, which claimed responsibility for the attack.

Under orders, exhibit organizers had earlier removed a plastic hand that was dangling from the exhibit's ceiling and partly obscured a fake severed leg encased in jeans and a bloodied black sneaker, The New York Times reported.

"President Bush says that people are either with us or against us, yet Arafat has allowed this outrageous exhibition under his own nose at a time when Arafat wants to be a part of an international coalition against terrorism," Hier said. "It certainly feeds into the idea that the Palestinians don't want peace."

A veteran expert on Arab affairs also found it significant that Arafat had delayed for two days before banning the exhibition.

"It seems Arafat is trying to see how much intifadah he can get away with in the framework of a ceasefire," said the analyst, who asked not to be identified.

Reporting on tactics, intimidation

According to Reports

Two items this week: First, a followup to last week's mention about the Palestinian Authority's intimidation of journalists whose films of Palestinians celebrating the World Trade Center bombings were confiscated.

Some news organizations, it appears, succumbed to the intimidation. The Israeli embassy in London officially complained to the BBC that its reporters had gone out of their way to minimize the celebrations as "unrepresentative" of the Palestinian public. It was unclear whether the BBC had succumbed to PA threats or had decided independently to act as an advocate for the PA (not the first time such a charge has been made). On Sept. 21, ABC's "Nightline" program also downplayed the extent of the celebrations.

By contrast, the CBC's Neil Macdonald has been forceful in reporting on PA tactics and the weakness of some other journalists in refusing to stand up for freedom of the press.

Criticism of the PA came at last not only from the Israel-based Foreign Press Association but also from the U.S.-based Committee to Protect Journalists, which sent a letter of complaint to PA Chairman Yasser Arafat, urging him "to ensure that Palestinian authorities immediately cease threatening and censoring journalists in PA-controlled areas."

Bassam Abu Sharif, an Arafat advisor, defended the clampdown on journalists saying it was necessary to prevent a wrong picture of Palestinian attitudes. "This was a normal preventive act... we don't want to give more to Zionist propaganda which portrays all Palestinians as terrorists," he said.

Responding to growing criticism, PA Information Minister Yasser Abed Rabbo sent a letter to news agencies saying that the PA "sincerely regrets any interference with the ability of the international press to conduct its work." The PA said it regretted confiscating videotapes and photographs from Western news agencies and promised to guarantee the safety of journalists and oppose censorship.

The second item: Essential reading are Globe and Mail columnists Marcus Gee ("Stop Making Excuses for Terrorism," Sept. 15; and "We must not shrink from it: This was War," Sept. 22) and Margaret Wente ("Why do they hate us so much?", Sept. 22). Both argue trenchantly against the widespread and simplistic view that U.S. foreign policy, including in particular its support for Israel, is the "root cause" of the terrorist attacks against the United States.

Gee also reminds us that "Even if Israel pulled out of the West Bank tomorrow, Islamic terrorist groups would keep trying to kill Israelis. To them it is not Israeli occupation that rankles. It is the very existence of Israel."

We need only recall the Hamas suicide bombings in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv in February and March 1996 when Israel, under Shimon Peres, was accelerating the implementation of Oslo, to see the truth of that claim.

Wente's article underscores this and related points and corrects misconceptions conveyed by some that Osama bin Laden and his followers always mention first and foremost U.S. support for Israel as the cause of their anti-Americanism. Bin Laden himself has emphasized that the "main problem" for him is U.S. involvement in the Persian Gulf, including its support for Saudi Arabia and Western "occupation" of the Islamic holy sites of Mecca and Medina.

The Week in Israel

Sept. 24

• The chair of the Islamic Movement in Israel, Sheikh Ra'ed Salah, called on U.S. President George W. Bush to convert to Islam. "The road to happiness, to security and to peace is Islam and I therefore call upon [President Bush] to convert to Islam so that justice, tolerance and brotherhood can be realized between the nations and the religions," Salah said.

Sept. 25

• Yasser Arafat reached an agreement with Hamas and Islamic Jihad to stop attacks on Israel for the time being, according to a West Bank leader of Arafat's Fatah movement. "Arafat is in full control of all the organizations operating against Israelis in the territories," Hussein Sheik told Army Radio on Tuesday. "All the factions: Fatah, Hamas, Islamic Jihad, all of them." Arafat has repeatedly stated in the past that he has no control over these terrorist groups.

Sept. 26

• Shimon Peres and Arafat agreed to take a series of steps aimed at turning a shaky, week-old truce into a lasting ceasefire. In a joint communique issued after two hours of talks at the Gaza airport, the two said they would hold a second meeting "within a week or so." Just three miles from their meeting site, violence erupted between Palestinian gunmen and the IDF; five Palestinians were killed; three IDF soldiers wounded.

• Yom Kippur.

Sept. 28

• Despite understandings to implement a ceasefire reached at a meeting Wednesday between Shimon Peres and Arafat, eight Israelis were injured and two Palestinians killed in the territories as the Palestinians marked one year since the start of the intifadah.

Shin Bet arrests more than 20 Hamas activists

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Most trained in Syria

JERUSALEM — The Shin Bet security service announced last Sunday that it had arrested more than 20 Hamas activists from the West Bank who had been trained in Syria and who had received orders from Hamas headquarters in Damascus.

Shin Bet, which is responsible for Israel's internal security, said some of the arrested activists had been involved in the suicide bombings in Netanya on April 30 and May 18 of this year that killed eight Israelis and injured dozens of others.

Two weeks ago, Ha'aretz reported that several senior members of the cell were indicted, including Hussein Za'al, a resident of a village near Jenin. Za'al received training for preparing explosive devices in Damascus. Shin Bet said the cell "was to play a very important part in the Hamas infrastructure" and was intended to significantly improve the efficiency of terror attacks. Security sources said more arrests are expected in the future.

Most of those arrested are students recruited by Hamas at universities in Syria, Yemen, Jordan, Sudan and other countries. The young men were recruited by Hamas activists from the Syrian headquarters and were sent for military training in Syria, Iran and Lebanon. The head of Hamas' headquarters in Syria, Imad al Alami, works with Haled Mashal, whom Israel attempted to assassinate four year ago in Amman.

During their training, the recruits were taught how to use weapons, how to prepare improved explosive devices from chemical substances and other methods of carrying out terror attacks. They were also trained to gather intelligence and to maintain secrecy. At the end of their training, the recruits were sent to the West Bank and Gaza to establish new terror cells.

Security sources said the knowledge acquired at the training camps abroad was then passed on to other Hamas activists in the territories and was used to carry out terror attacks inside Israel's pre-1967 borders.

Security sources said cell leaders planned to recruit Israeli Arabs too. They added that the operational level of the cells discovered by Shin Bet was worrying, both in the ability to carry out terror attacks and the information and techniques available for building explosive devices.

Israel wants terrorist groups on Bush's list

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel will demand that the Americans add Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah and a number of funds that transfer money to them to the list of 27 terror organizations the U.S. issued this week as linked to Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda, security and legal sources said yesterday.

According to a presidential order signed by U.S. President George W. Bush last week, the U.S. government is required to freeze the assets of any organization on the list and U.S. corporations are forbidden to do business with them.

Israeli sources said that while none of the organizations on the list are directly connected to Palestinian organizations, they suspect that in the past, some have transferred money under the guise of humanitarian aid to Palestinian terror groups and Hezbollah.

The sources said that in the past, Israel has asked the United States and European governments to act against organizations and companies that donated money to Hamas and Islamic Jihad under the guise of charity. The requests were rejected for lack of evidence or from fear of impinging on civil rights of American or European citizens.

Now, however, as the United States and Western Europe have begun taking significant steps to stem the flow of funding to terror groups, Israel is hoping for co-operation from those western governments.

The intelligence community here, along with the treasury and the central bank, have identified at least four organizations and funds, in Britain, Germany and France, that were "fronts" for Hamas. Israel outlawed activity by the groups in Israel but appeals to Paris, London and Berlin to take action against the groups were rejected.

Israel also claims to have evidence that Citibank, one of the world's largest banks, holds accounts by Bank al Aksa, one of the groups that Israel banned for its funding of the Hamas. Bank al Aksa received a banking license from the Palestinian Authority and sought commercial contacts with Israeli banks.

The law enforcement agencies and the Bank of Israel denied Bank al Aksa those rights.

The judges accepted the request, and everyone in the courtroom rose for the minute of silence before the trial began.

The opening week of the proceedings were largely devoted to reading the accusations. Statements were scheduled to begin this week.

The 20 defendants have not been charged with involvement in the actual attack.

Five of them, four former police officers and one car salesman, are accused of supplying the stolen van – later loaded with some 600 pounds of explosives – used in the bombing.

If found guilty, they could be sentenced to life imprisonment, the maximum punishment under Argentine law.

The other 15 have been charged for offences discovered during the investigation process.

Jewish and Argentine officials hope the trial may reveal who masterminded the attack.

Jewish leaders here and abroad have long blamed Argentina's inability to find the culprits on incompetence, corruption and anti-Semitism among security and government officials.

The terror attacks against the World Trade Center and Pentagon are likely to affect the trial, Jewish leaders, lawyers and victims' relatives agreed.

"The attacks in the United States may change the results of the AMIA trial," said Hugo Ostrower, president of AMIA. "There is more international pressure for convictions, and this has modified local attitudes."

For Marta Nercellas, a lawyer for DAIA, the Jewish umbrella organization, the attacks against the United States gave new meaning to the attacks that occurred in Argentina: "Terrorism is the common enemy, so this has to be a common fight. We need more international help."

Nercellas said she was "not nervous, but anxious" before the trial.

Prosecutor Alberto Nisman said he was surprised to see how calm he and the other three prosecutors were a few hours before the trial began.

The trial is expected to last between seven and 10 months.

During the first hours, it seemed that nothing was as usual in the courthouse.

"I've never seen so many journalists here," said Carlos Riera, who sells coffee near the main entrance.

Leandro Castro, who runs a refreshment stand on the first floor of the building, ran out of sandwiches before noon on the first day of the trial. Since opening for business, he had sold 65 jam-and-cheese sandwiches.

"That is double the usual amount," he said.

Britain's oldest synagogue turns 300

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — The oldest synagogue in Britain marked its 300th birthday with a special Shabbat celebration the weekend before Rosh Hashanah.

The Bevis Marks Synagogue was first dedicated the Shabbat before Rosh Hashanah 5462, according to the secular calendar, Sept. 30, 1701.

The 300th birthday celebration was the first of a series of related events that will include concerts, lectures, dinners and a museum exhibit, culminating in a daylong celebration Dec. 5.

In addition, a special commemorative stamp was to be issued Sept. 30.

Bevis Marks has an illustrious history.

It is the only synagogue in Britain designated a Grade I listed building by English Heritage, placing it among the country's most important monuments.

Famous past congregants include Sir Moses Montefiore, the Victorian-era philanthropist who travelled to Ottoman-ruled Palestine several times and established a hospital in Jerusalem.

The family converted to Christianity, but Benjamin Disraeli remained a supporter of Jews throughout his life – and the Prussian statesman Otto von Bismarck once admiringly called him "the crafty old Jew."

Jews first came to Britain in 1066, at the invitation of William the Conqueror, but were expelled in 1290 by Edward I.

For more than 350 years after, Jews were barred from settling in England. But when Puritan leader Oliver Cromwell overthrew the monarchy in 1649, Jews saw an opportunity to return.

In 1655, the rabbi of Amsterdam's Portuguese Jewish community petitioned Cromwell to allow Jews to settle in England.

The sympathetic Lord Protector, as Cromwell styled himself, convened a special conference of clergy, merchants and judges to consider the question, but dissolved it when it looked as if the conferees were going to vote against re-admission.

'The synagogue opened in 1701 after being built at cost by a Quaker'

Taking the lack of reply for a yes, Sephardi Jews began to trickle back into England, and by 1657 they had leased a house in the city of London, the small district in the heart of the capital, to use as a synagogue.

A legal case fought that year by Antonio Robles, who was a marrano – a Jew who professed Christianity following the Inquisition in Spain and Portugal – established the legal right of Jews to live in England.

By 1699, the Spanish and Portuguese Jews Congregation was in a position to build a synagogue of its own – and it bought property on Bevis Marks Street.

The synagogue opened in 1701 after being built at cost by a Quaker who refused to make a profit on the construction of a house of worship.

The Great Synagogue in Amsterdam, which had been established 25 years before, donated a chandelier that is still in use today.

According to tradition, the future Queen Anne presented an oak beam that is part of the roof.

The current rabbi at Bevis Marks, Abraham Levy, describes the synagogue as "probably the only place in Europe where Jewish worship has continued uninterrupted for 300 years."

Despite its long history, community leaders admit that the synagogue is in search of a new mission.

The neighbourhood where it is located, the city of London, was once home to a large Jewish community, but today is more known as a financial centre.

With few Jews now living in the area and Ashkenazi Jews greatly in the majority in England, Bevis Marks' Sephardi leaders have stated, "It has been clear for almost a century that Bevis Marks is not sustainable as a family or local community synagogue."

The synagogue hosts morning prayers for some of the Jewish professionals who work in London's financial district, and synagogue officials hope to attract more with a new building that will serve as a kosher bistro when it opens after Sukkot.

Additionally, leaders hope to use Bevis Marks' unique history and central location to turn it into the "cathedral synagogue" of Anglo Jewry, the site where major community occasions are celebrated.

In 1995, the synagogue hosted Jewish commemorations of the 50th anniversary of V-E Day and, in 1997, the first state visit by a president of Israel to Britain.

In 1999, when the City of London installed its most recent Jewish lord mayor, Lord Levene, Bevis Marks was the site.

Straw reconciles with Israel

By TIM PULLMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Britain's Foreign Minister Jack Straw, says his country "stands squarely" behind Israel in its own fight against terrorism and has never implied that Israel has made the terrorists' job easier.

His conciliatory remarks came after he held talks in Jerusalem with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon last week.

The meeting had been cancelled by Sharon, who was angry at words used by Straw in an Iranian newspaper article.

Straw had issued a statement saying, "I understand that one of the factors that helps breed terrorism is the anger many people in this region feel at events over the years in Palestine."

But the meeting was rescheduled after a 15-minute telephone conversation between the Israeli and British prime ministers.

Straw arrived in Israel fresh from his country's first high-level visit to Iran since the 1979 Islamic Revolution.

His trip to Tehran was set up hurriedly as an effort to woo Iran into the American-led anti-terrorist coalition, for which Straw received guarded support.

Iran supports Hamas and Hezbollah, which target Israel, and has been accused of harboring and training terrorists, and financing terrorist activities in several countries.

"I stand squarely behind Israel and against terror inflicted on it," said Straw in remarks from Jerusalem carried on British television. He said that during his four-year stint as home secretary, the British government minister in charge of internal security, he had banned 21 pro-terrorist organizations, including the military wings of Hamas and Hezbollah.

"The purpose of my visit here is to deepen my understanding of the suffering of the people of Israel, but also to assist in the peace process," he said.

The comments to which Israel had objected appeared to indicate a shift in British policy.

Sharon's office had called Straw's remarks "one-sided and sympathetic to Palestinian terrorism" and Sharon cancelled the planned meeting. President Moshe Katsav followed suit.

Adding fuel to the fire in Straw's statement about terrorism was the use of the term "Palestine," which was regarded in Israel as a de facto upgrading by Britain of its attitude toward the Palestinian Authority.

Second annual Jewish heritage day held in Europe

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUDAPEST — This month's second annual European Day of Jewish Culture drew more than 175,000 visitors in nearly two dozen countries.

"The number of visitors and of visited sites compared to last year were greatly increased," organizers said in a statement.

Held Sept. 2 in 23 countries, the event aimed at recognizing Jewish heritage as an integral part of the cultural heritage of Europe, promoting tourism to Jewish heritage sites, and fostering both Jewish pride and a sense of European Jewish identity.

Another goal was to educate the non-Jewish public about Jews and Judaism in order to de-mystify the Jewish world and foster tolerance.

Hundreds of synagogues, Jewish cemeteries, ritual baths, medieval ghettos and Jewish museums were opened to the public in more than 250 cities, towns and villages.

In addition, there were special exhibitions, concerts and other events – from book fairs to food-tastings – and special brochures, leaflets and other informational material was distributed.

Participating countries included Austria, Belgium, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, the Czech Republic, Romania, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Switzerland, Turkey, Ukraine and United Kingdom.

Some 16 countries took part in the first Culture Day last year, drawing as many as 150,000 visitors.

The Culture Day was organized by B'nai Brith Europe, the European Council of Jewish Communities, the Jewish Routes of Spain and the Tourist Development Agency of France's Alsace region. It was also part of the Council of Europe's project, Europe, a Common Heritage.

Organizers said that despite tensions related to the ongoing Israeli-Palestinian violence and the anti-Semitic rhetoric at the U.N. conference on racism held recently in South Africa, events were not marred by any serious incidents.

"There was a very, very good attendance and good atmosphere," said Catherine Lehmann of the Alsace tourist Development Agency. "It exceeded our expectations."

Culture Day activities in France, sponsored by the ministries of culture and of tourism, included 120 events in 60 towns.

More than two dozen sites were on display in Germany, and in Spain, home to 20,000 Jews, about a dozen medieval ghettos in towns including Toledo, Girona, and Tudela were the focus of a variety of events.

Events in Italy, sponsored by the president and the Culture Ministry, took place in 36 towns and cities.

Italy's undersecretary for culture, Vittorio Sgarbi, and other senior officials took part in an official ceremony in Bologna, a city that is home today to 200 Jews.

"Even without being born Jewish or being of the Jewish religion, we all are or have been Jews in virtue of the dialogue that Jewish civilization has had with Italian civilization, interrupted only in moments of ferocity and barbarism," Sgarbi said.

One attack too many

By SHLOMIT LUCICH

Comment

I first came to Israel over 30 years ago as a kibbutz volunteer. This was during the War of Attrition and my kibbutz on the Jordan border wasn't far from the Golan Heights.

The summer before I left home I remember lifeguarding and everyone saying I must have a death wish not only to go to Israel, but to live on the border no less. When I got to the kibbutz the first words I learned in Hebrew were: land mine, hand grenade, bomb shelter, attack, reconnaissance mission, and terrorist. New Year's Eve 1969/70 was celebrated in a bomb shelter because, as we said then, "the PLO brought the noisemakers," which they had done many a night before and after.

I never thought I felt any fear but a year later when I was a student at Tel Aviv University, it was noted at a faculty meeting that two students always turned white whenever dynamite exploded at the construction sites on campus. The two students were of course me, and another student who had come from a border settlement.

I finally left Israel, but not permanently, and 10 years later I put my money where my mouth was and officially cast my lot with the Jewish State. I made aliyah – immigrated to Israel. No temporary resident status for me. I argued with my shaliach/government immigration representative. I wanted and received immediate citizenship upon my return to Israel and I have never regretted that decision.

In the more than 20 years since my return, I have lived through several wars, including being evacuated when Scuds flew over my house. Like my fellow countrymen, I have worried and cried over innumerable terrorist attacks, and attended more funerals than I care to remember. I have borne my children here, and like every other mother in this country who dares to admit it, live with the blood curdling thought that every time I hear of a dead child, that there but for the grace of God goes my own.

But I am a New Yorker, the daughter of native New Yorkers. My father was a well-known figure on the West Side of Manhattan, and my mother was from Hell's Kitchen, now fashionably known as Clinton. I graduated from high school on 50th Street and Lexington, and I got my passport to come to Israel from the State Department Office at Rockefeller Center on Fifth Avenue, just across the street from St. Patrick's Cathedral. You can't get more NY'er than that.

From the way I speak English to the way I walk down the street, from Casablanca to Moscow, strangers have identified me as a New Yorker. I physically left New York, but New York has never left me.

On Sept. 11, when terrorists cut through the heart of the World Trade Center, something also tore straight through my heart. Trite maybe, but also true. Though the world has changed irrevocably because of this tragedy, I regrettably admit that I too, will never be the same.

Granted, I have no right to complain. My family was lucky: one nephew is a NYPD uniformed cop and very well could have been at the site. But if Israelis are good at anything, it's a human response to terrorist attacks. After dialling direct for hours, I finally called Bezeq, and in my Anglo-Saxon accent said that although I know everyone is trying to get through, I really did have a nephew who is a NYC cop and may have been there. For an Israeli switchboard operator that was enough – he got me though.

We were fortunate – it was my nephew's day off. Unbeknownst to me, however, another nephew was injured but only slightly and is alive and whole, already home from the hospital. Everything is relative and for sure, we were very lucky.

But I believe that even if I wasn't a New Yorker, I would still be stunned by the insanity of Sept. 11. The victims of the Pentagon attack, and those brave souls who lost their lives fighting the terrorists crashing in Western Pennsylvania, I don't cry any less for them. Just as my wonderful Russian friend Marina cries no less than I do. And she never had dinner at Windows on the World.

Windows on the World was the exclusive restaurant on the top floor of the WTC. So "classy" you had to wait three months to get a reservation. Oh the elegant dinner dates! Once to impress me a boyfriend got reservations for the same night. I'll never forget him telling me "don't ask how much this cost me because I don't even know, and I'm not talking about dinner. I'll be owing people favors for years."

Did it impress me? Well, yes, but I am only one of many who could tell you the same tale or another about the WTC.

Stories and lives, all mixed together like the entwined rubble of the WTC itself. New stories of disaster victims whose acts of immeasurable courage and kindness continually move me to tears. And for me, just like that mass of ruin which is now the stony grave of so many, I sadly see no end in sight.

The children. All children. The children there and the children around the world. Nobody has been left unscathed.

What I had shielded successfully from my own small children for the last four-and-a-half years in Israel, was smacked into their faces via our TV screen. My four year old son asked me "mommy, why did the man put the plane in the building?" What do I say, that he made a wrong turn?

Wanted or not, reality crashed into all of our lives on that horrid September day. Children are receiving counselling from Los Angeles to the suburbs of Paris, and they need it.

All my friends, and especially Americans, are feeling the same. Regular beach dates have been cancelled by unanimous consent, and nobody has been going anywhere except to obligatory family gatherings for the holidays. Ironically, the day after the attack I noticed that all my New York friends called each other, and without even speaking to each other, we left the same message on each other's voice mails: "my family's okay, my friends are all right, but I heard about so and so..."

We haven't had the courage to call each other back yet.

I deeply admire New York Mayor Rudy Guiliani, and applaud his pro-active advice on how we can all help: "Go back to your lives. Go out – to dinner, to the movies, to a show. Go back to work, to school. To go on living is the biggest tribute and help you can give to the fallen and to the city."

I agree with him wholeheartedly. However, this time I can't do it. This time it's going to take some time. Though prayer has helped, this time no book I read, no course I take, not even a magic wand if I had one, can get me over what is the unbelievable, the unfathomable, and the never to be forgotten.

May their souls rest in peace and may their memories be a blessing. Amen.

Murky war against terror

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast analysis

America's looming war against the forces of international terrorism is replete with question marks.

Three weeks after suicidal Arab terrorists crashed commercial airplanes into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, killing thousands of civilians in the worst single act of terrorism in history, the coming struggle begs more questions than it answers.

Beyond the assumption that the United States and its allies will focus on Osama bin Laden's Al-Qaida terrorist network in Taliban-controlled Afghanistan in the first phase of the war, everything else is murky.

What role, if any, will Israel – the object of incessant terrorism – play? At the insistence of Arab states, Israel was sidelined during the 1991 Gulf War, despite being hit by a barrage of 29 Iraqi Scud missiles. And now, once again, Israel will probably be left out of a coalition being assembled by the United States.

Pakistan, a Muslim state which helped create and nurture the Taliban but presently serves as a forward base from which to prosecute the battle against bin Laden, has declared that neither Israel nor India should be members.

George W. Bush, in his speech to the U.S. Congress, said that "any nation that continues to harbour or support terrorism will be regarded ...as a hostile regime."

Does that mean that the coalition, in the next phase, will target Muslim countries such as Syria, Iraq, Iran, Libya and Sudan? They have been described by the U.S. State Department as state sponsors of terrorism.

Whether they are eventually targeted, militarily, diplomatically or economically, will ultimately depend on Washington's definition of terrorism. And this is where the problem really begins.

In the immediate aftermath of the Sept. 11 atrocities, France's ambassador to Israel suggested that the terrorism directed against the United States is not necessarily identical to the terrorism inflicted on Israel by Islamic Jihad, headquartered in Damascus; and Hamas, based in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and tolerated by the Palestinian Authority (PA).

Hamas and Islamic Jihad, which support the Taliban, both rejected the latest ceasefire reached by Shimon Peres and Yasser Arafat last week, warning of further violence.

Arab coalition members, principally Saudi Arabia, have drawn a sharp distinction between bin Laden's form of terrorism and that practised by Israel's Islamic fundamentalist enemies.

The Bush administration has not disclosed its position on this debate, but when it froze the assets of 26 groups and individuals linked to terrorism, Islamic Jihad and Hamas were conspicuously missing.

Israel strongly believes that a war against terrorism should combat all kinds of terrorism. As Ariel Sharon put it: "There is no good and bad terrorism."

Yet it remains to be seen whether Washington, sooner or later, will take a much closer, harder look at states like Syria and Iran which back terrorists fighting Israel.

Paul Wolfowitz, the U.S. deputy secretary of defence, spoke of "ending states (that) sponsor terrorism." But his statement was subsequently disavowed by the United States.

What seems clearer is that Israel will pay a political price for Arab support of the coalition. As in 1991, the Arabs will demand sweeping concessions from Israel in the form of further withdrawals from the West Bank and Gaza. Israel will not be able to resist these pressures.

Arafat, having quickly quelled pro- bin Laden parades in the territories that acutely embarrassed the PA but revealed the true depths of local sentiment, has jumped on the coalition bandwagon, hoping for political dividends at a later date. A decade ago, he lined up behind Iraq and lived to regret it. He has learned from the error of his ways.

In some American circles, there is a feeling that now is the time for the United States to finish off Iraq, a source of instability in the region. But since there is no clear link between Iraq and the Sept. 11 attacks, Saddam Hussein may be granted immunity.

Children celebrate the holidays

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A book about the Jewish holidays can be very boring. It is much more fun to read when the book tells the story about children preparing and celebrating the holy days.

That is what Rahel Musleah and Rabbi Michael Klayman decided to do when they wrote Sharing Blessings: children's stories for exploring the spirit of the Jewish holidays (Jewish Lights, 1997). Illustrations are by Mary O'Keefe Young.

The book takes Ilana and her little brother David and their mother and father through the Jewish year, talking about all the holy days, as well as Shabbat. The chapter about each holiday not only talks about what happens, and the historical background of each one, but teaches an important lesson that can be found in it.

For instance, the chapter about Sukkot, in which Ilana helps her dad build the sukkah, and she, David and her Mom help decorate it, talks about accepting the differences in people. Ilana has a friend with only one arm, who is often teased by the other kids at school.

"It's not nice when people pick on other people just because they're different," Ilana said. Dad explains "Everyone is different, but we all use our own talents to make the world better.'

On Tu B'Shevat, Danny learns from his grandfather how important it is to take care of the environment, on Rosh Hashanah, the children talk about taking responsibility for your actions, and on Purim they learn about giving to others.

Their grandmother is a Holocaust survivor, and through her they realize how lucky they are to live in modern times, and what evil hatred can cause.

In a lot of books written for children, the kids in the stories act like such angels that you just know they are made up. Sharing Blessings is different. Ilana and David fight, they tease each other, they get scared, and yes, they help each other too. David sneaks a piece of dough that is supposed to be for the hamantaschen.

Even their dog Frisky was included when he "got flour on his nose and gobbled the chips that fell under the table."

SHIMRON'S SUKKA

This story takes place in the time of Joshua, who led the Jewish people into the Land of Israel after the death of Moses.

Shimron was puzzled. His father had just returned from seven years of fighting for the Land of Israel, and the family was still moving into their new home in the Carmel. So why was Abba (Father) building a shed outside? Curiously, Shimron sat in the lush grass, watching Abba set up the walls and secure them together with wooden pegs. Abba climbed down the rickety ladder, apparently done.

"Abba? Are you building a stable for the animals? And why isn't there a roof?" burst out Shimron.

"I'm building a sukka," replied Abba.

"A what?"

"I'll explain later. It has to be finished by tonight. And there will be a roof. A roof of branches and leaves. Do you think you can help me get some from the forest?"

Still confused, Shimron followed his father into the adjoining grove of trees. Abba chopped off some leafy branches, and with Shimron's assistance carried them back to the sukka. Shimron passed the branches up to him, and he carefully placed them on wooden slats spanning the width of the sukka.

After descending the ladder, he announced, "Now let's bring in the table."

"WHAT?" gasped Shimron incredulously.

That night, Shimron and his little sister Batsheva ate dinner with Abba and Imma in the Sukka. The air was clear and crisp. "All right, Abba, you said you'd explain what's going on. Why are we here tonight?" asked Shimron.

"Shimron," said Abba, "You're nine years old, but when we entered Israel you were just a baby. I remember the day when the Jordan River split, and we crossed over on dry land. You laughed, and reached out your hand, trying to touch the rising wall of water. But before that, the Jewish people lived in the desert for forty years. Your mother and I — and you, Shimron — were all born in that barren desert, a wilderness empty of water, and teeming with deadly scorpions and venomous snakes. I remember looking out at the vast desert, endless dunes until the horizon, motionless except for the flashes of sunlight on the backs of the slithering snakes. By day the heat grew almost unbearable, but at night we shivered from the cold."

"So how did you live?" asked Batsheva.

"God took care of us. He gave us water to drink, and manna to eat."

"But what about the snakes?"

"I'm getting to that. God shielded us. Our entire encampment had walls of cloud around it. Literally."

Shimron struggled to comprehend what his father was saying.

"Walls… made out of clouds?"

"Yes," said Imma. "They were beautiful, too."

"Beautiful," concurred Abba, "and effective. I never saw a snake inside the camp."

"It was as if God had built a house protecting us." added Imma.

Abba smiled. "And that's why He commanded us to build Sukkas every year. So that we will always remember his loving protection."

"So that's why we're eating in here?"

"Exactly," answered Imma. She looked up, through the gaps in the branches and leaves, and continued, almost dreamily, "I can see the stars. Just like I could in the desert."

"I'm tired, Imma," yawned Batsheva.

"It's past both your bedtimes!" realized Imma with a start. "Shimron, Batsheva, it's time to go to sleep!"

"May I sleep in the sukka?" asked Shimron.

"You slept in the cold for 40 years! Can't I do it just once?"

"Well..." mused Imma.

"Hmm..." considered Abba.

"I guess you could." Imma finally conceded. "But if it gets too cold, or starts raining, you're coming inside."

Shimron lay on his hay mattress. A slight breeze made him shiver. But as he looked up through the canopy of leaves, and saw the stars shining down at him, he could almost feel the desert all around him, and see the snakes writhing through the dunes of sand.

Latest Amos Gitai film, Eden, is a missed opportunity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Amos Gitai's first English-language film, Eden, is riddled with problems.

Premiered at the recent Toronto International Film Festival, it lacks the vigour and depth of his two most recent movies, the bracing Kippur and the controversial Kadosh.

A film with a definite message, Eden is set in Palestine and the United States between 1940 and 1946, when the Holocaust was raging and the battle for Jewish sovereignty was being joined.

Adapted from Arthur Miller's novel, Homely Girl, it begins when Kalman (Danny Huston), a Jewish American businessman, informs his father (played by Miller) that he is settling in Palestine.

Kalman's motives are purely mercenary. He believes that there are profits to be made buying and selling Arab land.

His father, a world-weary cynic, tries to dissuade Kalman. "You're going from capitalism back to feudalism in one generation," he says, warning him that he may dispossess Palestinian Arabs if he purchases a surfeit of land.

Undeterred, Kalman leaves the comforts of America for the uncertainties of the Middle East. His sister, Samantha (Samantha Morton), and her husband, Dov (Thomas Jane), are already in Palestine. Unlike Kalman, they are committed Zionists.

It's clear that Samantha has little regard or patience for her brother. "The world is at war and Jews are being slaughtered and all you care about is money," she observes tartly, a remark that seems to have no effect on the acquisitive Kalman.

Far from being preoccupied by the bottom line, Samantha and Dov are idealists. Dov – an architect of the Bauhaus school – wants to build the new country, but in concert with local Arabs, and to fight injustice.

His views are shared by Oscar Kalkofsky (Luke Holland), a sombre German-Jewish bookseller who left his family behind in Europe and who has not heard from them in quite a while.

Kalkofsky, though reticent, boils with anger. In his opinion, Britain – the colonial power in Palestine – has betrayed Jews by having restricted Jewish immigration, this at a time when the Nazis are exterminating Jews.

Like Dov, he applies exceedingly liberal precepts to the Arab-Jewish conflict in Palestine. Jews and Arabs, he feels, should share the country on the basis of mutual respect and understanding.

And how, he wonders in another meditative moment, can Jews come to terms with the fact that Arabs love the same land?

In light of the current Palestinian uprising, the message is both resonant and relevant.

Kalkofsky's lodger, Silvia (Daphna Kastner), sees the world through narrower lenses. She hates the British because they are denying oppressed European Jews access to a new home in Palestine.

Eden, however, is not wholly political. Samantha's deteriorating relationship with Dov is delineated, as is her growing attraction to Kalkofsky.

Eden examines their minds, but never penetrates their souls. Worse still, the actors appear stiff, unanimated and utterly disconnected from their Middle Eastern milieu.

And surprisingly, Gitai portrays Arabs, who are so integral to the essence of the plot, as silent passersby in kaffiyas.

Floating by like ghosts, they are essentially ciphers, occasionally seen, but never heard. Gitai's cavalier treatment of them is simply incomprehensible.

Although Eden was shot in Israel, it is strangely generic atmospherically. It leaves no compelling footprints in the sands of the coastal plain. It might as well have been photographed in a back lot in Canada.

More egregiously, Eden is bloodless dramatically. It is bereft of any tension, and the one and only spark of passion is ignited when Dov, who has volunteered as a soldier in the Jewish Brigade, returns to Samantha from the war in Europe.

In the end, Eden is as dry and lifeless as Kalkofsky's arid bookshop. What a missed opportunity.

Unique approach to familiar genre

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

In Divided We Fall, a childless Czech couple in wartime Czechoslovakia reluctantly harbours a Jewish friend from the Nazis.

Unlike many other "Jew-hiding-in-the-attic" films, though, this one is refreshingly different. For one thing there is a very fine line between hero and villain; both do things you wouldn't expect. And the unexpected plot twists keep you guessing till the end.

One night in 1943, Josef comes across David Weiner, the Jewish son of Josef's former employer. David escaped from a concentration camp in Poland and returned to his Czech hometown. When a planned meeting with an acquaintance of David fails to materialize, Josef takes pity on David's fate and decides to take him home.

This new arrival causes much tension in an already troubled marriage. Then come a series of complications. Josef and his wife Marie are often visited unexpectedly by an annoying colleague, Horst, a Nazi collaborator. They realize the danger they face but letting David go will only put them in more danger. If he gets caught the Nazis will undoubtedly trace him to them.

It also appears that Horst is getting suspicious of the couple's attention to the closet (the hidden room's entrance is through the closet). To complicate things, Horst has a romantic attraction to Marie and when she refuses his advances, Horst plans revenge by attempting to move a Nazi clerk into their house.

Marie (Anna Siskova) and David (Csongor Kassai) make a startling decision in Divided We Fall.

To prevent this unexpected and dangerous situation, the trio is forced to make a startling, shocking decision.

Divided We Fall takes a unique approach to this familiar genre of Holocaust movies. It is about characters, and the truths they learn about themselves and others. There's also a series of complications and coincidences throughout the film that lead to the startling ending.

Divided We Fall, directed by Jan Hrebejk, was nominated for an Academy Award for Best Foreign Language Film (it lost to Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon). It is running at selected theatres including Cumberland and Bayview in Toronto. It is shown with English subtitles.

FUSION artist enjoys creating Judaica

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Montreal artist Sheila Caplan has always enjoyed working with her hands since she took her first wheel class in the mid 1970s.

"My fascination with clay has continued to grow," she says. "For me, it is the ultimate experience in creating something from nothing. To take a lump of mud and fashion an attractive, useful and durable object, that gives pleasure to both the creator and the user, is tremendously satisfying."

Caplan will be one of the exhibitors at The Pottery & Glass Sale of FUSION: The Ontario Clay & Glass Association show at the CBC Centre in Toronto from Oct. 10 to 13.

Her pottery is at several Judaica shops in Montreal and Toronto, and her "secular" works are at The Canadian Guild of Crafts in Montreal and the Snapdragon Gallery in Ottawa.

Caplan studied occupational therapy at McGill University, but a few years into her career, she took an evening course in pottery at the Saidye Bronfman Centre, School of Fine Arts "just for fun" and to relax after a day's work.

"It did not take long for me to get thoroughly hooked," she says.

After two years at pottery, she decided to leave occupational therapy and pursue pottery instead. In 1981, a group of five potters opened a co-operative pottery studio, Tour de Force.

After slowing down while her children were young, she resumed her pottery in 1995 and joined the Baie d'Urfe Potters Guild.

Caplan began producing Jewish ceremonial ware. The Judaica pieces are special, she says, "because they are used for unique occasions. These are incised with decorative Hebrew lettering appropriate to their function. She adds that they add beauty to the various rituals and holiday celebrations.

"There is a long and interesting history of Jewish ceremonial art in our tradition, and I feel I am now a link in this chain."

Caplan produces such things as seder plates and matzah plates for Passover, ceremonial wine goblets, Sabbath candlesticks, apple and honey bowls for Rosh Hashanah, ritual hand washing cups with bowls, mezuzahs and others. Her pieces are subdued and simple. Their classic, traditional style is designed to endure for years to come.

Caplan notes that working with clay "has many lessons for us in life" – patience and perseverance in developing skills and going through the many stages required to reach a finished product, accepting failures and losses in the course of production, establishing standards of quality for oneself – being able to destroy a pot that does not measure up, and flexibility in adapting to changes in clay or glaze materials that alter your work.

BOOKS IN CANADA & AMAZON GIVE OUT FIRST NOVEL AWARD

Books in Canada, the 30-year-old literary journal that almost washed up on the rocks of insolvency last year, has returned just in time to renew its 24-year-old tradition – handing out, in conjunction with a major bookseller, a first novel award.

The journal's editor, Olga Stein, joined with Amazon-dot-com representative Marven Krug and a panel of literary judges headed by author W. P. Kinsella to award the first-prize trophy and a cheque for $5,000 (US) to Mississauga-based author Eva Stachniak for her novel Necessary Lies (Dundurn, $19.99).

Stachniak was one of five finalists (the others are Steven Galloway, Scott Gardiner, Susan Juby and Lydia Kwa) who read brief passages from their works at a gala reception at the Capitol Theatre on Yonge Street. All five of their novels had been published in the year 2000.

Soon after Stachniak was pronounced the winner, the October 2001 issue of Books in Canada was brought out, with a cover story on her and her winning novel. The issue had evidently been kept under wraps until the winner was announced.

The Polish-born author joins a long and impressive list of previous winners, including Michael Ondaatje, Clark Blaise, W. P. Kinsella, Rick Salutin, Nino Ricci, Rohinton Mistry and Anne Michaels.

Set in Berlin, Warsaw, Wroclaw (Breslau) and Montreal, Necessary Lies "tells the story of a woman's discovery of the secrets and lies that stitch together empires and individual lives," a publicist said.

The awards ceremony seems a triumphant return for the journal which, like Canada's book industry itself, has undergone major difficulties in recent times. It resumed publication in July. As before, the publisher is Adrian Stein.

The latest Books in Canada contains much of general interest. Readers with a specific interest in Canadian Jewish literature will be drawn to Toronto writer Ken Sherman's article, Five Pieces for Irving Layton, a warm memoir of his long association with the Montreal poet.

Books in Canada is available at news stands for $4.50.

Winnipeg Jewish Theatre: WJT has announced its upcoming season, which begins Oct. 11 with a new production of Sibs, the comedy by Diane Flacks and Richard Greenblatt.

Shylock, written and directed by British actor Gareth Armstrong, is "a richly humane portrait of one of the Bard's most misunderstood characters." It runs Nov. 28 to Dec. 2.

Victoria, written and performed by Dulcinea Langfelder and Eric Gingras, is a multimedia dance and theatre piece about a 90-year-old woman who loses her memory but not her vitality. March 13 to 17, 2002.

Funny Girl, the Broadway musical classic, focuses on the celebrated entertainer Fanny Brice. It runs May 11 to 26, 2002.

A magical mystery tour

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Local film producer-director Ric Bienstock says that she missed many comforts of home when she shlepped all over China, India and Egypt to make a series of three hour-long TV documentaries featuring Penn and Teller, a celebrated pair of stage magicians from Las Vegas.

But the veteran filmmaker, whose previous works include an acclaimed documentary on Zaire's Ebola virus outbreak and a segment of the Emmy Award-winning documentary The Plague Monkeys, said that travelling with Penn and Teller was a culturally enriching experience despite the various deprivations encountered.

Bienstock directed the first hour-long episode based in China, and produced the other two episodes, which are set to premiere under the title Penn and Teller's Magic and Mystery Tour on CBC television on Oct. 2, 9 and 16. A British-Canadian Yorkshire-Associated Producers co-production, the series is slated for repeat broadcast on the Learning Channel later this year.

Essentially, the programs focus on the two flashy American magicians as they seek out their professional colleagues in the three countries, and learn the secrets of magical tricks that in some cases are thousands of years old.

The China segment features acrobatics, juggling, street magicians in remote villages, and an astonishing mask trick that requires such dexterity that it remains seamless even when replayed in slow motion.

Ric Bienstock on a magical mystery tour

Throughout, the oversized Penn projects the persona of a wise-cracking, happy-go-lucky narrator with the comic sensibility of a David Letterman, while his considerably smaller, silent sidekick, Teller, is a sort of Harpo Marx of the magic set.

Bienstock said it took a year to set up the itinerary for the shoot, which ventured into numerous remote rural locations.

"We did as much research as we could here, and then we went there to do more research," she said. "We got as many leads as we could in advance, and then we got even more on location. I travelled ahead of Penn and Teller. There was a lot of planning on this trip, a lot of moving around."

Although the company ardently sought out exotic forms of local magic, their taste in cuisine was considerably less experimental. Bienstock made sure to bring a supply of canned Chinese food from home.

As a Canadian, she said she felt well prepared for cold weather – but not, as it turned out, for a winter in the Chinese countryside. The temperature typically fell to 15 degrees below zero, she said, and none of the buildings were heated.

"I come from Canada, and I can certainly handle the cold," she said. "But not like this. This was relentless."

After a road accident in which the company's van was sideswiped by a truck on a snowy country road, they had to wait around in the cold once more. "I looked at Penn at one point and I said, 'Ebola was easier than this,'" Bienstock recalled.

REFLECTIONS ON A NEW AGE

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

In some way, being on a modern jet aircraft is like riding a magic carpet from the Arabian Nights.

No matter how often I fly, I always retain a sense of awe and wonder about the essentially miraculous process of jet travel.

Have you ever wondered how Leif Erikson, Marco Polo or Christopher Columbus might have regarded this modern miracle? Could they have possibly imagined that we would one day sit in comfort and be transported in mere hours over vast global reaches that took them months to traverse?

Unforgettable scenes of earthly beauty often reveal themselves from above. My own mental photo album includes many remarkable vistas: the volcanic Mount St. Helen's by moonlight ... the soft blue waters of the Caribbean ... the vast snowy mountains of Greenland.

Leaving Cancun, the glittering deluxe hotels along the beach stand like a row of children's toys.

Approaching Hong Kong, the jet comes so close to highrise buildings that laundry hanging on the balconies seems to flap in the undercurrents.

On a sun-drenched afternoon over Turkey, a multitude of steely crescents glint like scimitars atop mosques in a multitude of remote villages.

After a long night of travel, the coast of Israel suddenly appears, and the endless dark sea surrenders to the ancient unyielding land of our heritage.

And then there's Manhattan by twilight: the silhouetted towers a poetic testament of what our civilization has become.

Forgive me: I am writing as if the golden age of jet travel has concluded, and that is definitely not the case. But the smoke and ash that covered lower Manhattan on Sept. 11 has filtered across the planet, in a psychological sense, like the residue of a modern Krakatoa. Not surprisingly, the global tourism industry has started to choke.

Since the American tragedy, aircraft built for hundreds are carrying dozens of passengers, and hotels from Honolulu to Hamburg are reporting dismal vacancy rates. Consumers have been scared away, temporarily at least, from an industry that pumps a huge percentage of the global economy. Perhaps tourism will rebound soon, or perhaps war will intervene.

In any event, it seems insane to write another travel column as if it were business as usual. Let us hope the global tourism sector emerges soon from the after-effects of Sept. 11.

London's Bevis Marks Synagogue, which marks its 300th anniversary this week, was one of only a few buildings in its east-end neighbourhood to emerge unscathed from another sort of devastation – the Nazi bombing blitz of WWII.

Twice rattled by IRA bombs intended for nearby targets, the elegant brown-brick building still stands proudly in its tiny protective courtyard. The architectural elegance of this synagogue, the oldest in Great Britain, reflects the glory that its Sephardi congregants felt living in a country where they were able to pray freely as Jews.

Inside the shul, the rows of wooden pews, multi-tiered brass candelabras and elaborate Torah ark are remarkably well-preserved. Near the front, a special chair is still roped off in honour of Sir Moses Montefiore (1784-1885), the synagogue's most accomplished and celebrated congregant.

Two other famous congregants were Isaac D'Israeli (1766-1848), author of numerous volumes of literary history and anecdotes, and his son, Benjamin Disraeli, who was circumcised here in 1804 and later became the British prime minister. (By then, however, the family had converted to Christianity.)

Regarded as the "cathedral synagogue" of British Jewry, Bevis Marks is used for many important ceremonial occasions. It was here that the Jewish community commemorated the 50th anniversary of V-E Day in 1995, and here that the city installed its most recent Jewish lord mayor, Lord Levene, in 1999.

A series of concerts, lectures, dinners and other special events have been scheduled at Bevis Marks between now and early December. The shul is situated within walking distance of both the Aldgate and the Liverpool Street underground stations.

Except for special events, the synagogue is not normally open to the public on a daily basis. A good way to see it is by going on a walking tour of the Jewish East End, making sure that it is on the itinerary.

Storyteller praises matchmakers at Yiddishland Cafe

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO – Marriages arranged by parents in Polish shtetls lasted longer and were more practical than today's marriages storyteller Nathan Garnick suggested recently.

The matchmakers did a good job, took their task seriously, and made good choices, Garnick said at the 31st Yiddishland Cafe at Workmen's Circle during an evening devoted to stories by Isaac Bashevis Singer about matchmakers.

It was rounded out with singing of Yiddish songs about "shidduchim" by Flying Bulgar's David Wall, accompanied by Sasha Luminsky. The two stories by Garnick, each told by a woman, dealt with matchmaking in the shtetls. They were taken from a book by Singer with the title, freely translated, of Fireside Stories.

He thanked Henia and Nachem Reinharts for being the resource people for the Singer stories. Though full of humour, which brought many a laugh from the audience, especially as Garnick is a good actor, the stories had a moral message by the writer who won a Nobel Peace Prize in 1978. They illustrated that people are their own worst enemies.

In one, a wealthy woman is in search of a bride for her son, and even though she uses all her skills to do it, picks a woman who brings the family's business to ruin. In the other, a haughty woman who has landed a popular yeshiva bocher for a husband, puts on such airs that she causes her husband to divorce her, and ends up in a poorhouse. No one attends her funeral.

Garnick said the arranged marriages lasted because the couple was not blinded by romance. "The couple had to build their love in the years after the marriage," he said. It was not unusual for a woman to have her passage paid by her future husband when she came to Canada. But she knew she was coming as a bride.

Though he told the stories with an authentic Polish accent, Garnick said it would not deter those who were descended from Jews from other countries "because it was the Yiddish that was spoken on Spadina Avenue and in Kensington." The spelling of Yiddish words is standard, he said, but Jews coming from different countries have their own accents.

Garnick interwove his stories with English so that non-Yiddish speakers would not be left out. Wall and Luminsky added to the enjoyment of the evening. Wall, who has been studying Hebrew and Yiddish, told The CJN that, if not for being paid for composing music for film and TV, he would not be able to support his young son. His singing at affairs like the tribute to Singer is voluntary.

He composed the music for Struma, the documentary about the ship full of Jewish refugees that was torpedoed. Wall said his latest project is composing music for a huge project in Japan. With Miriam Lerner, he has composed music for the classics as well.

Business Profile

Lack of education, easy credit pose risk to family finances

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

The average Canadian is unable to properly manage his finances, says Toronto trustee in bankruptcy, Frank Kisluk.

In recent years, Kisluk has become increasingly concerned about bankruptcy and insolvency trends in the country.

In 2000, he says, he watched as 87,529 Canadians made insolvency filings. These filings include consumer proposals, whereby a repayment plan is developed, and bankruptcy, in which most outstanding loans are forgiven.

This year, he predicts that personal insolvencies could increase by more than 17 percent.

'When an individual has financial problems it generates unbelievable stress'

Consumer proposals are expected to increase to between 25 and 30 percent of total consumer insolvency filings within the next two years, following trends occurring in the United States.

"Rates of savings have plummeted and the amount of credit carried by individuals has skyrocketed," Kisluk explains.

"This is a prescription for disaster."

Kisluk, who has been specializing in helping individuals and businesses negotiate settlements with lending institutions for over 24 years, is president of Debtor Consulting Services Ltd. and vice-president of Mandelbaum and Spergel Inc.

He does not necessarily believe that businesses and individuals are to blame for finding themselves sinking into financial quicksand, he says.

"One of the biggest problems with the system is that it's been created and structured by lending institutions and they don't feel an obligation to educate people on how to live within the credit environment they've created.

"I've always felt that this is a system that to a large extent is stacked against the individual. You have large financial institutions and organizations that sell credit such as commodities to people who do not have a strong education in commodities."

In addition to a lack of education, many people are overcome by the pitches these institutions put out to convince consumers that they can afford the kind of lifestyle they want to lead.

"The result is that people take on more credit than perhaps they should."

"Companies look at those able to carry credit cards – not at their ability to pay."

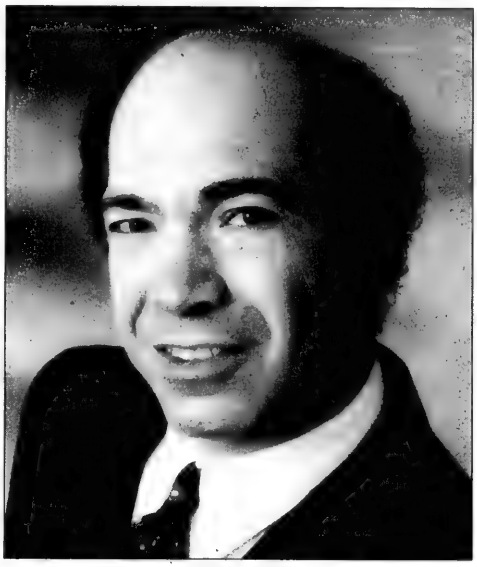
In fact, issuance of credit cards remains high, and that rate continues unabated. Go to any professional sporting event or walk through a university campus, Kisluk says, and many can expect to be grabbed by the gimmick of giving out personal information in exchange for a credit card and a T-shirt.

He says the heaviest blitz of unsolicited credit card applications came in the mid-1990s, when independent credit cards, such as Capital One, joined the market.

Kisluk warns that when an individual has too many credit cards and is carrying too much debt, "it doesn't take much to push you over the edge of the cliff."

A number of factors can impair one's ability to repay debt, including the loss of job, or the temporary loss of income due to pregnancy or illness.

"When an individual has severe financial problems, it generates unbelievable stress. This can lead to illness, and aggravate personal problems."



Frank Kisluk

Kisluk says that sickness, separation and even divorce are "very common" when dealing with financial difficulty.

As a trustee in bankruptcy, Kisluk helps people who have lost financial control to regain their lives, acting as a neutral negotiator between the besieged and the debtor, and also acting as "a bit of a social worker," he says.

Through dealing with clients, giving lectures and writing for magazines, newspapers and also through his books, titled, Life after Debt, and Dear Creditor, Kisluk says he gives people psychological counselling.

"I try to help people accept failure and learn from it. I try to bring understanding to people so they can regain control, dignity and their self-respect."

Kisluk says he prides himself on informing the public "in plain English," skills he learned while majoring in English literature as an undergraduate student at the University of Western Ontario.

His books began as booklets, 'but the writer in me took over'

Though he applied to a master's program in creative writing at the University of British Columbia, Kisluk says he didn't have the money to pursue it, and went into accounting after a friend convinced him to try it out.

After becoming a chartered accountant and working in the field for a few years, Kisluk decided to specialize, and has been practising as a trustee in bankruptcy since 1980.

He says his books, both published by Doubleday in 1999 (the first edition of Life after Debt came out in 1996), began as booklets, "but the writer in me took over."

He says that he would like his next book to focus on how individuals can survive in the economy, noting that "there's a vacuum in literature on how to be responsible with credit cards."

But with major positions in two companies and as a member of five financial institutions, including The Insolvency Institute of Canada which works with the government and looks at changing relevant statutes, Kisluk hasn't had time to start his third book, or even to take a real vacation.

He says his last trip was more business than pleasure. He and his wife, an English professor, drove to Montreal where they helped their daughter settle into McGill law school, all the while looking out for credit card solicitors on campus.

MONTREAL — More than 1,600 Jewish community members turned out to have their bone marrow tested in the hope that it will match that of a 33-year-old man suffering from leukemia.

Dr. Barry Mishkin of New York, who grew up in Montreal, was diagnosed with acute lymphocytic leukemia 2 ½ years ago. After successful treatment at Memorial Sloan Kettering Hospital, the disease recently returned.

"A bone marrow transplant is now my only option and time is of the essence," Mishkin wrote in an appeal to Montrealers. Neither his two siblings nor his parents, Dr. Seymour and Shaindel Mishkin of Montreal are matches.

Hundreds had to be turned away because Héma-Québec, the provincial blood agency, had only 975 vials available, said the elder Dr. Mishkin.

"The turnout was very impressive. We swamped Héma-Québec's capacity," he said. The agency can process 200 samples at its laboratory per week and can farm out another 100-150, he said. The rest is frozen for testing at a later date.

The results will not be known for at least several weeks.

Dr. Mishkin said others wishing to be tested may make an appointment with Héma-Québec at 832-5000, ext. 234. The contact person is Diane Roy.

Barry Mishkin grew up in the Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem synagogue, where his parents are active members. He graduated from McGill University and then studied at the Albert Einstein Medical College of Yeshiva University in New York.

Before he became ill, he was chief resident in internal medicine at the Montefiore Medical Centre in the Bronx, and remains associated with that institution.

The Tifereth's Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz said the massive turnout was "absolutely remarkable. It's one of those things that inspire you, especially after seeing in New York the evil that humans are capable of."

He describes those lining up as "Jews of every stripe," including large numbers from the synagogue and notably from the chassidic communities, whose rabbis made a special plea for participation.

The elder Mishkin noted that the testing may benefit others besides his son.

All samples will be kept in the Héma-Québec registry.

Seniors & Health

Dear Dr. Veinish,

I'm getting older and worried about my memory. It's not as sharp as it used to be.

Should I be worried?

Ruth

Dear Ruth,

A missed appointment, a complete blank on a familiar face, the inability to remember the plot of a movie. It happens to all of us. Could this be Alzheimer's or just part of "normal aging?" How do we differentiate the two?

Memory is a complex system made up of five parts, some of which decline with age while others remain stable or even improve. Overall, these changes do not interfere significantly with our ability to function independently over time.

The adage that old age brings wisdom is not a myth. Semantic memory is defined as the accumulation of facts and experience gained over a lifetime. It is therefore not surprising how, under "normal" conditions, semantic memory or wisdom, grows with age.

Remote memory is also well preserved as we age. This is best reflected in the personal histories transmitted from generation to generation. Similarly, immediate memory is relatively stable. It can be distinguished from recent memory in that it enables individuals to remember information for several seconds (e.g. a new phone number), rather than for minutes, hours, or days. Prospective memory refers to a person's ability to remember to complete a task in the future. The use of simple cues such as calendars and lists helps to preserve prospective memory. Without these aids, however, it tends to decline, like recent memory.

Changes in recent memory, in association with impairments in language and reasoning, are among the earliest changes seen in dementia. These deficits produce progressive dependence and disability, and it is this which best differentiates dementia from normal aging.

If you are concerned that your memory problems are interfering with your daily activities, a screening evaluation by an experienced physician is warranted. Perhaps underlying medical or emotional problems, or medications, are contributing to your difficulties. These can all negatively affect memory changes. Please remember, however, adjustment of medications should be supervised by your doctor. Specialized memory clinics, and/or a neuropsychology assessment may also be helpful in providing you with recommendations for maximizing your memory and function.

Why not join your children and grandchildren as they return to school this term. Register for a new course in an area that interests you. New learning and new experiences are just two factors that can positively affect memory change. Good health is a great beginning to the New Year as well.

And eating well, while staying active, mentally, physically and socially, will also help promote good health, good memory, and good memories.

Readers can find out lots of interesting facts about memory loss and dementia on the Web at www.baycrest.org. Look for the direct link on the home page to an interactive educational site, Memory Loss and Dementia.

Shanah Tovah.

Judo master helps people with disabilities

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yoseph (Joseph) Lev was once a highly-accomplished athlete, though he walks with the aid of a cane now. He's in his 60s and though he's broad-shouldered, his frame narrows at the waist and he looks somewhat fragile, like a square salt shaker perched on top of two narrow and shaky toothpicks.

But don't let his appearance fool you. Lev is still plenty tough, far from a pushover even for a determined mugger. With his quickness and strength, he can turn an assailant's size against him and make him regret ever considering him an easy mark.

Lev is a fourth dan black belt in judo who can also call upon a full repertoire of deadly moves from many other martial arts disciplines. Whether seated or standing, the Israeli judokan (practitioner of judo) can easily disarm an attacker, as he demonstrated on this reporter, inviting me to try to choke him and then deflecting my arm with two quick movements that felt like he was simultaneously breaking my wrist and dislocating my shoulder – not to mention what he was doing to my elbow.

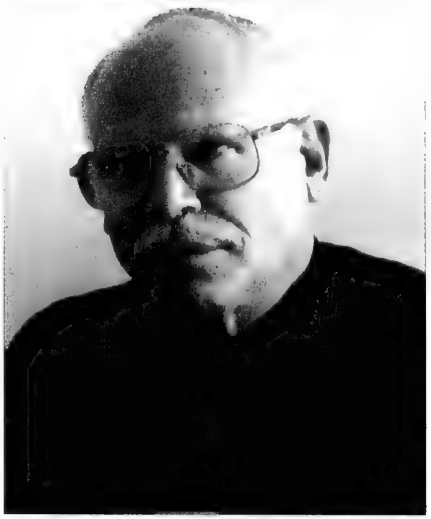
Lev, who was totally paralyzed at age 12 by polio, believes that having a disability does not mean one lacks the ability to employ martial arts.

In 1972, Lev formed Israel's first organized judo and self-defense group for people with disabilities and the blind. Since then, he has been a tireless advocate for people with disabilities. He currently serves as sports director for Population with Special Needs and a rehabilitation consultant with Shekel, a community service organization for people with disabilities in Jerusalem.

He was in Toronto recently to establish contacts and sound out the possibility of opening a centre in which to instruct Canadians with disabilities on self-defence.

Lev believes that sports like judo and karate are perfect rehabilitation and recreation activities for people with disabilities, with the type of sport easily matched to the particular disability.

Judo, he said, is perfect for the blind, where close-in grappling is practiced. Karate is best for the deaf, where the quick and precise arm movements of sign language lend themselves to karate punches and blocks.



Yoseph (Joseph) Lev

Even paraplegics confined to a wheelchair (and sometimes quadriplegics) can learn a mixture of self-defence moves that will leave an attacker begging for mercy, as demonstrated on this reporter.

People with disabilities are no different than the broader population in enjoying many benefits from sports, including increased self-confidence, good exercise, the ability to defend oneself and more effective rehabilitation, he said.

"The martial arts are much more popular than simple, boring, repetitive physical therapy," he said.

Today, at his job with Shekel, Lev teaches and qualifies sports trainers who in turn go out to the community and work with Israelis with disabilities, including those with special needs. He heads the national professional committee of BUDO-Martial Arts for the Disabled, is a member of the International Federation of Adopted Physical Activities and serves as chair of the Israel Sports Therapy Association.

Author of Judo and Self Defence for the Disabled, Lev is hoping to hook up with either a hospital, dojo (judo studio) or university in Toronto to further locally his rehabilitation ideas.

Lev's own story could serve as an inspiration to others with disabilities. In 1952, at 12½, he was struck with polio. For three days, he lay unconscious and had difficulty breathing. When he regained consciousness, he was paralyzed. He spent the next year in hospital, receiving physical therapy and working hard to regain control of his limbs. Through hard work and determination, Lev regained motor control.

At 17, he and a Boy Scout troop were doing volunteer work in a rundown neighborhood in Jerusalem when a gang of hoodlums set upon them. Unable to run, he was caught and beaten.

The experience left him determined not to be helpless again in the face of muggers. He enrolled in a judo class – Israel's first – taught by a Japanese black belt who was in Israel on UN duty.

After being told to spend one month on the sidelines watching, Lev was allowed onto the mat and taught ground fighting – Ne Waza – which included holds, arm locks and strangulation techniques. Later he moved to his feet where he was taught flips and throws.

When he became a blue belt, he moved to Rishon Lezion, where he opened his own dojo. It proved popular almost immediately and soon it grew to 600 members. Among them was a young Moni Aizik, who later would go on to train future Olympic silver medal winner Yael Arad before moving to Toronto. (Aizik has subsequently returned to Israel).

Arad was not particularly blessed with natural ability but emulated Aizik in working hard ad showing tremendous character, Lev said.

In 1972, Lev opened his first martial arts group for people with disabilities and the blind and worked with army veterans with disabilities.

By April 1977 he was touring Europe and giving lectures and demonstrations. In 1995 the Municipality of Jerusalem named Lev employee of the year and a year later, the president of Israel named him best Israeli civil servant.

To contact Lev while in Toronto (on or before Oct. 11), call 416-730-0438. In Israel, he may be reached at 972-2-672-0157/8 or by e-mail at: joelev@zahav.net.il.

Toronto marathon raises funds for charity

TORONTO — The seventh annual Canadian International Marathon, a qualifying event for the Boston Marathon, will run through the streets of Toronto on Sunday, Oct. 14.

Starting at 9 a.m. at Mel Lastman Square, the 42-kilometre (26-mile) race follows a loop through North York before heading south on Yonge Street. Runners will trace a route through Forest Hill, Rosedale, the Valley Ravine and downtown Toronto before ending at the finish line at Queen's Park.

A less grueling alternative is also available. Participants can choose to contest the Home Depot Half Marathon or take part in the Honda Corporate Challenge, a relay race.

Organizers are expecting between 7,000 and 8,000 athletes from as many as 30 countries.

The Canadian International Marathon is sanctioned by Athletics Canada and the Ontario Roadrunners Association. It has raised more than $2 million for various charities since the first race in 1995.

A quest for peace is all around us

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Evil blinds us.

In the past couple of weeks, the North American community has been stared down by terrorist activities perpetrated by some very vile people. Seeing the level of brutality in the destruction of the World Trade Center and the Pentagon was disquieting and unsettling.

It blinded many of us into believing that these dastardly events are now the only defining character of the world which we all share. Lately, I've heard from countless Torontonians that the world has turned ugly and is mostly evil. Most disturbing, however, is what I have been told by many young Jewish teens and children.

Recently, I did a program for bar and bat mitzvah kids. I enacted a mock radio show with them, the topic being Can the World Achieve Peace? Unanimously, our newest community adults replied that peace was elusive, and not likely to ever be achieved. I was very saddened and wondered how they arrived at such a jaded view.

I asked them why is it that children dying in Zimbabwe of HIV/AIDS are more positive about their future and world goodness than Jewish kids growing up in Toronto?

"Don't we live in one of the finest times in history, in perhaps the greatest city ever?" I asked. "Why are we so negative about the possibility of achieving world peace? Have you not seen hundreds of examples of chesed (kindness) and the pursuit of the talmudic statement 'the highest wisdom is kindness'?".

Remember, I said, that as the twin towers toppled, physicians around the world were sewing up the wounds of the impoverished and new organizations were developing educational methods to enhance the lives of autistic children.

Keep in mind, I told them, that before and while the Pentagon burned, enormous examples of love and humanity were taking place. Jews from Tomchai Shabbat, an organization supplying food for Shabbat in Toronto, were preparing boxes to be dropped off for families in Toronto; the State of Israel, through Mashav, its foreign office's humanitarian arm, was assisting millions of people in Africa through the sharing of irrigation technology and other such agricultural know-how. Craig Kielburger, a kid from Thornhill, continues to free the children, from child slavery in South Asia.

There is beauty and a quest for peace all around us. It appears in a blade of grass; in the sweet face of a volunteer from Beth Shalom and its homeless program; in the spirit of Native Canadians assisting their broken families through the slow reconstruction of their integrity.

If a peaceful world can never be achieved, then what of all the potential within our neshamot – our souls – which feeds on goodness? If peace, love and understanding are no longer the pillars upon which the world stands, and instead we have adopted the view that the world is malevolent, then our hunt for peace – osei shalom bimromav – is a useless one.

The stench emanating from the evil of Sept. 11th is overwhelming. It permeates our world like the Roman wisps of fire and smoke hurled at Masada. Yet we can never allow it to be so pervasive that it deadens our drive for shalom and encourages us to believe that evil is the predominant character trait of our world. If we do so, our souls will remain hungry and listless, void of splendid nutrients that can only be pollinated through peace, and we will never achieve the brilliance and beauty within us, and inherent to our world.

MAPLE-GLAZED CARROTS WITH CHERRIES

WE SELL Amana FOR LESS

1 lb. carrots, peeled and sliced
1 cup frozen unsweetened tart cherries
3 tblsps. maple syrup
2 tblsps. margarine
1/2 tsp. ground nutmeg
1/4 tsp. ground ginger

In a 2 qt. saucepan, cook carrots in water, covered, 8-10 minutes or until tender. Drain well.

Add cherries, maple syrup, margarine, nutmeg and ginger to cooked carrots. (It is not necessary to thaw cherries before combining with carrots.) Cook, stirring occasionally, over medium heat, until mixture is hot and bubbly.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My Aunt Sally and Aunt Faye are using me as a broken telephone. About three years ago they had a blowout fight and haven't spoken since.

Being their only niece, I am very close to both of them and speak to them regularly. They always have something to say about one another, but if something goes wrong, such as my Aunt Sally's heart scare last year, Aunt Faye is on the phone and had to know every detail. The sad part is that they really love and care about each other. They even wished each other a "happy new year" through me. Both of them are Holocaust survivors and are getting on in years. My biggest fear is that something will happen to one of them and the other will never forgive themselves, and neither will I. How do I put an end to this ridiculous feud?

Centre of Attention

Dear Centre of Attention,

These two people have put you in a very difficult place without really meaning to.

You are enabling them to continue their relationship without having to speak to each other. They each get to know what is going on with the other through you. They know if the other is healthy, if they have a problem and what is happening in their lives. There really is no need for them to speak if they can use you as a crutch in their broken relationship.

Start by putting an end to letting them talk through you. Explain to them that you love them both dearly, but you think their fighting has gone on long enough and you will not let them use you as their communicator any longer. This may ruffle some feathers as they may not even realize they have been doing anything wrong.

Try to explain gently that they are getting on in years, and if they don't make peace they may end up regretting it. The most difficult thing for you, because of your love for them, is to stop being the enabler of this broken relationship. By not passing on their words, you may force them back into each others lives.

Situated on 52 wooded acres, near downtown Toronto, are the graceful Estates of Sunnybrook. The historic McLean and Vaughan Estates provide everything for your upcoming celebration.

At the Estates of Sunnybrook, you will see exquisitely decorated rooms, and experience the most superb cuisine in the city. The Estates can comfortably accommodate weddings with as many as 150 guests. Many celebrities have also chosen the Estates for their special wedding day.

Elegance captures your special day

Elizabethan style typical of a large stone country manor house. This exceptional restoration has retained all its historic character with two elegantly refurbished ballrooms, each with a capacity of 150.

The grandeur continues throughout the Estates with sculptured gardens, patios, and stone walkways overlooking the Don River ravine. Any part of this landscape makes the Vaughan Estate a photo opportunity for your bridal group, family and friends.

McLean House:
Stately Elegance Renewed

McLean House dates back to 1929, when James McLean commissioned architect Eric Arthur to design his stately family home.

The result was BayView, now known as McLean House - one of Ontario's finest Georgian-style mansions. Set amid the natural beauty of Gordon Culham's award winning landscaping, McLean House is as magnificent today as it was in the 1920s.

Windsor Arms was built in 1927, in the elegant Neo-Gothic style. Its distinctive exterior made it a fine example of a mid-sized early 20th century hotel with a residential appearance.. It soon becme a Toronto landmark, both for architecture and design, and as the place to be seen. In its heyday, it was a discreet "home away from home" for celebrities like Katharine Hepburn, Gloria Swanson, Richard Burton, Vincent Price and Christopher Plummer.

Windsor Arms was sold early in the '90s, then closed in 1991. Developer George Friedmann bought it in 1995, determined to reinstate it as Toronto's hallmark luxury hotel. Working with Sol Wassermuhl of Page + Steele, and with Heritage Toronto (the hotel is a Heritage site), Friedmann set to his task.

"It was essential that the site remain true to its original purpose," he says. "Windsor Arms has no equal in Toronto; and I wanted to create an environment where that sense of innovation would again flourish."

While Windsor Arms has an august history, an even more spectacular future lies ahead. Friedmann is fulfilling his dream. Windsor Arms' guests will enjoy elegance and discreet luxury, innovative entertainment venues, sophisticated business facilities and a sumptuous Spa. Making this diversity a cohesive whole, was the task of interior designer Brian Gluckstein.

The results speak for themselves. Windsor Arms is one of the few hotels in the world which successfully blend traditional and leading edge design, making guests feel at home, while providing state-of-the-art services and luxuries that satisfy the most discerning travellers.

Friedmann and his team anticipate many long-staying guests. This, combined with the original Windsor Arms' deluxe character, inspired Gluckstein to create contemporary spaces which are luxurious, yet home-like.

Guestrooms feature naturally lit bathrooms, crisp Frette bed linens, and a rich palette of colours and wallpapers. Gluckstein has based the custom-designed mahogany furnishings on a 1920s French style he describes as "streamlined, but not overly modern, and designed to give echoes of the past." The spacious bathrooms feature limestone floors and walls; and several suites have fireplaces.

Windsor Arms' reputation for food harks back to its heyday. In this respect too, Friedmann and his team have revitalized a tradition, but with a contemporary touch. The hotel's restaurants present diners with a range of styles in cuisine and ambience – and venues for special events.

The Courtyard Cafe is drama in architectural form, with its iron entrance gates, limestone walls, soaring ceilings, skylights and balconies, with funky lighting to add intriguing counterpoints. This setting is great for weddings or other private functions with up to 250 guests seated, or 750 standing.

In Club 22, Windsor Arms' cocktail bar and nightspot, sumptuous dark woods and fabrics in leather and mohair create a cozy atmosphere. There's a dance floor, and you can have live music; there's room for up to 200 guests for wedding or cocktail receptions or showers. Most intimate is the Tea Room, built around an impressive fireplace dating from 1927. The stained-glass windows were also part of the original hotel; and lush velvets and silks impart a luxuriant aura. This setting is ideal for private dinners, receptions and showers for up to 40 guests.

There are private dining and meeting rooms for groups from six to 100. And for a really special gathering, there's the Chef's Table. Up to 10 guests sit at their own table, in the middle of the kitchen, with a chef cooking the dinner of their choice. Then there's the Spa. For anyone who wants to be pampered during an overnight stay, this is the crowning touch. It is also open to the general public.

Gluckstein wanted the Spa to be, "luxurious and intimate, restful yet energizing, with a holistic feeling". Serenity and beauty in one"s surroundings, he thought, contribute to the rejuvenation of mind and spirit.

He achieved this effect with beautiful natural woods and pale cotton-terry fabrics. You'll see inspiration in the poolside fireplace, and the entrance to the swimming pool, reached by a set of gracefully curving steps. This is a full-service Spa with every health and beauty treatment, including facials, massages and hot stone therapies. There's an exercise room and swimming pool. And the Darphin beauty product line raises the Spa to a level of sumptuousness and luxury not attained elsewhere.

Inside and out, Windsor Arms has regained its status as Toronto's landmark luxury hotel. Once again, it's a "home away from home" for celebrities like Michael Douglas, Harrison Ford, Danny De Vito, Cher, Tina Turner, Sophia Loren and Jennifer Lopez. Windsor Arms will be glad to host your special event, be it a wedding, dinner party or seminar. And its downtown location makes it ideal for out-of-town guests. They're only steps away from Bloor St. shopping, theatres and subway stations.

There's another reason to consider Windsor Arms for your simchah. Among the recent additions is the Kosher Kitchen. Whether it's a business function or a personal celebration, the hotel's fine culinary style and expertise is now under strict Kashrut supervision.

For off-premise events, consult Royal Kosher Catering Inc. With culinary and service supervision from Windsor Arms, Royal Kosher Catering Inc. provides a delightful culinary experience at a location of your choice. Windsor Arms also includes the Residences of Windsor Arms, an exclusive collection of 24 homes, on 12 floors above the hotel. They average about 3,500 square feet, with panoramic southern views and finishings unparallelled in the city. Custom designs are available.

Residents have full access to hotel amenities including maid and room service, valet, concierge, and the Spa. At the same time, they enjoy the privacy and security of a separate entrance and elevators. At present, three units remain for sale, 2,800 and 3,300 square feet in size, ranging from $2,500,000 to $3,000,000.

You'll find Windsor Arms at 18 St. Thomas St., just south of Bloor, off University Ave. For reservations, and more information about venues for your special event, call 416-971-9666.

Boy's Dress wear mirrors men's designer wear

Boys any age can now look as "smart" as their older brothers or fathers. Men's wear designers are now producing up-to-date "in" styles for boys. Dress suits are available in 2 or 3-button single-breasted, classic double-breasted, and modern, redesigned tuxedos but without all the bulk around the shoulders and chest areas. Hip sports jackets, vests in solids or patterns also add to the variety.

As in men's wear, the important factor to remember is co-ordination. Plan the wardrobe to be flexible so it saves you money. Work around a basic suit and add coloured shirts and ties, a T, or sweater, depending on the occasion. You'll be surprised how many times you can produce a totally different look!

Sales on boy's wear are in the fall (late August to October) so mark your calendar to take advantage of the great prices. A little tailoring can usually stretch the life of a suit to the next size.

You can breath a little easier knowing that slim or husky sizes are now in ample supply. Suits are available in sizes 4-20. Note that sizes 12-20 are perfect for boys of Bar Mitzvah age as they fit a teenage boys' rapidly growing body!

Richmond Hill, a club for all seasons

Richmond Hill Country Club has always offered a restful setting amid lush greenery, with inviting nature walks through acres of land laced with lakes and ponds. If you want to escape life's pressures and recharge your personal energy, nowhere else could be more inviting.

In the past two years, the club has been extensively refurbished -- both to enhance the service, and make it easier for you to enjoy the natural beauty. The response to the changes has been enthusiastic; but don't take anyone's word for it. Tour the renovated club, and see for yourself.

Richmond Hill Country Club offers you full catering service for your wedding or other special occasion, in a setting that unites beautiful countryside with urbane comfort. It's formal and elegant, but at the same time warm, comfortable and relaxing. For the duration of your function, the club becomes your home.

Richmond Hill Country Club is a year-round setting. It offers a great variety of indoor and outdoor facilities for dining, receptions, weddings and other special occasions.

Tents and poolside patios are available for outdoor functions. Many Orthodox weddings are held outdoors here, in the valley by the river which winds through the grounds.

The indoor facilities are spacious and richly appointed. Of the two largest halls, the Georgian Room can hold up to 350 guests seated at dinner, with a dance floor; the Regency Room, up to 130 at dinner, with a dance floor. And these rooms have high, wide windows, with panoramic views of the surrounding countryside. There are smaller rooms for more modest functions, ranging in size from intimate to spacious. For the year 5761, Richmond Hill Country Club hosted 12 seders in two days, for groups of up to 100.

The catering facility, now called Club Catering, is owned by Richmond Hill Country Club. It's recently been revamped from the ground up. Lino Ferreira is catering manager; the executive chef is Kim Wong. Both men have had extensive professional experience at Four Seasons. They know that one of the key elements of a celebration is fine dining in a beautiful ambience. They take pride in meticulous attention to the details of planning and follow-through that make a simchah a success. And they're open to any creative use of either indoor or outdoor facilities, or both. At one wedding held in the river valley, for example, guests were conveyed to the site in golf carts.

Catering facility and club now have separate kitchens; and the layout has been changed to protect everyone's privacy, so that you and your guests need not interact with club members at all. For your function, you enjoy exclusive private use of the catering facilities.

Charity and fundraising groups, many of them Jewish, use the facilities; and the club hosts many corporate functions. You'll find all the amenities you need to help make a meeting productive: a variety of venues, seating from five to 500, and refreshment catering. You can book any time span, from a few hours' meeting up to a full day. And if you want to reward your work force with a day of rest and recreation, there's no better venue than Richmond Hill Country Club.

If you join as a member, you and your guests may want to drop in for lunch or dinner. There are new all-you-can-eat lunch and dinner buffets, and a variety of dining experiences from casual to formal. You can get a quick snack after a workout; relax over an evening drink; or enjoy a fine dinner with a special friend. Thinking of fitness and an active lifestyle? Would you enjoy having access to the club's pools, sports and health facilities on a regular basis? There are 12 different types of membership to suit everyone's needs, from occasional visitor to habitué, from toddler to senior.

If you sponsor a guest who eventually joins the club, you earn a $200 Ambassador Credit toward your own membership costs. And there's a Youth Club, and a summer day camp for kids from tots to teens.

The new Club Spa offers men and women a full range of hair care, massage, body therapies and other personalized services. And if you like to swim year-round, you'll find both indoor and outdoor pools.

Do you have a more specialized health or sport interest? Specialty classes include cycling, yoga and pilates. There's an extensive tennis program too, both indoor and outdoor, for every level of skill from first-time player to seasoned pro, with highly qualified professional instructors and organized competition. With closed-circuit TV and security staff on the grounds, the club is working to make your visits not only enjoyable, but safe. You and your guests should always feel secure.

Richmond Hill Country Club is located at 8905 Bathurst St. in Richmond Hill, just a quarter mile north of Highway 7; and it's easy to reach by Highways 401, 404 and 407 ETR. You can speak to Catering Manager Lino Ferreira, or inquire about tours, membership and activities, at 905-731-2800.

A special day...

The welcoming ambiance of a beautiful Country Club setting. A choice of intimate rooms or a classically inspired Grand Banquet Hall lit with sparkling crystal chandeliers. A contemporary cuisine customized to your particular needs. And a helpful staff committed to anticipating your every wish. This is the Richmond Hill Country Club - a very special place for your special day.

The ideal locale for your event is Columbus Centre, Toronto's vibrant Italian cultural nexus. Its facilities can host parties of 5 to 400; the catering offers classic Italian cuisine.

The newly renovated Sala Caboto banquet hall, resplendent with gleaming hardwood floors and marble lobby, seats 300 wedding guests. For outdoor festivities, you'll enjoy the Mediterranean Garden Patio. Rustic Ristorante Boccaccio serves regional Italian cuisine's irresistible flavours in a charming, intimate setting. For private functions, it holds up to 100. For a kids' party, with swimming and pizza, Caffe Cinquecento holds up to 40. It's also great for a refresher after visiting the fitness centre, or a light meal.

The main floor of the Carrier Gallery can accommodate 350 for cocktails or 200 seated. The beautiful Rotonda Gallery hosts up to 180 wedding guests. And Columbus Centre offers wheelchair accessible spaces for every size and type of meeting from seminar to staff party: The Boccaccio Boardroom easily holds 20 people. For up to 40, there's the elegant Executive Boardroom, with its antique table and Italian tooled-leather chairs. Both have full catering and audio-video service.

The Columbus Room, with dance floor, cloakroom and bar. Its subtle, rich decor makes it suitable for functions from breakfast meetings to evening galas, with up to 100 guests.

Director of Food Services Joe Cosentino has worked at Ontario Place and AGO. With his rich experience catering Jewish events, especially weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, he looks forward to hearing from you. And there's no better place to rejuvenate than the friendly, well-staffed Fitness Facility. There's weight and cardio equipment, aerobics, aquabics, Nautilus, gym, pool, squash, racquetball, track and tennis; programs include yoga, judo, tai chi and water safety. There are tournaments and championships as well.

Columbus Centre hosts numerous cultural programs. The Carrier Gallery's design has been compared to New York's Guggenheim Museum; the School of Music teaches year-round; and the Puccini Symphonic Band, the Schola Cantorum and Giuseppe Verdi choirs, and the acclaimed Scuola di Danza have their home here.

So if you're planning a special event, call Joe Cosentino at Columbus Centre: 416-789-7011 ext. 236. They're located at 901 Lawrence Avenue West, at Dufferin. And there's ample free parking.

Les Firestone functions marry old values with culinary innovations

Over four decades of synagogue catering, Sam Firestone Caterers has earned the kind of reputation that only years of excellence can produce. In a simcha market of many players, those with a 40-year track record are few and far between, a fact not lost on Firestone's loyal customers. So, in an increasingly competitive catering marketplace, Les Firestone has seen his business continue to grow as new generations of brides and grooms jump on the Firestone bandwagon.

It's particularly gratifying, notes Les, to experience the enduring value of the legacy his father built.

"My father always stressed the importance of treating each customer like they were your only customer, so the good feedback doesn't really surprise me," says Les. "What does surprise me is how people remember the little things, like something my father said or did that made them feel good. That's the part of the business that money can't buy."

This kind of feedback helps fuel the 24-hour adrenaline surge that sees Les attending to simcha details into the wee hours of most mornings. "We do whatever it takes to make our customers happy," he smiles. "When someone picks you to host the most important day of their life, how can you do otherwise?"

In Firestone's case, the long hours devoted to catering functions can't really be described as "hard work." "It's only 'hard' when you don't enjoy what you're doing," grins Les. "When you love it, it's easy."

Under the direction of Executive Chef Jimmy Lyras, the consistent first class cuisine that has made the Sam Firestone name legendary has evolved to reflect the latest culinary trends while still respecting time-honoured traditions. The Sam Firestone / Shaarei Shomayim experience is now enhanced by some exciting new developments:

- A fresh juice bar;
- A Sushi bar;
- A Chocolate fountain;
- A Cappuccino / Espresso bar.

Each of these "bars" or stations allows you to personalize items to your taste. The chocolate fountain, in particular, has proved a hit with customers of all ages.

The authentic regional cuisine and exquisite preparation that have always been a Sam Firestone trademark are enjoyed in Shaarei Shomayim's magnificent banquet facilities. If you haven't had the pleasure of attending a function at Shaarei Shomayim in the past few years, you're in for a big surprise. After a major renovation, the beautifully updated premises are now the envy of many stand-alone banquet halls. The shul's traditional haymishe feeling remains, and is available to members and non-members alike.

Tricia Cochran "the best thing that ever happened to a bridal gown"

In the world of fashion, there are thousands of design houses, but only a few are capable of consistently creating a collection of couture quality. Tricia Cochran Collections is one.

Tricia's legacy lives on. Continuing the tradition of bridal refinement that has defined the Tricia Cochran name for decades, Isabella Briatico and Carol Gold cater to an ever-growing clientele at the same location, together with the same in-house specialists that have served hundreds of happy brides there.

The signature look of high style, femininity, and a unique approach to detail also remains. You can see it in the more than 100 fine gowns — each one exclusive to Tricia Cochran — that grace the shop. These works of art, fashioned from the finest silks, laces and other fabrics, feature rouleau, beading, tucking, appliqué, embroidery and weaving, all applied by hand. Soft, subtle hand finishings lend a further touch of refinement. From concept to creation, each and every garment aspires to the same standard of excellence, and each is designed to enhance your individual beauty.

Consultant Carol Gold has a stellar reputation in the bridal business. Carol enhances the expertise and personal service you will receive when you book your appointment here. The Tricia Cochran team has a level of experience and dedication unparalleled in the industry.

In addition to bridal and evening wear, Tricia Cochran specializes in Mother of the Bride. All mothers who shop here will receive the same care and attention their brides expect. The wide range of styles will accommodate any figure and taste. Whether you like elegant classics or lavish detail, indulge your fantasy: it's here.

This outstanding shop addresses your needs not only for weddings, but for every formal or special occasion as well. Be it an afternoon cocktail party or an evening at the theatre, the event will be your personal stage in a Tricia Cochran gown.

Specializing in Mother of the Bride

Another advantage of shopping at Tricia Cochran is the opportunity to have your engagement ring or wedding band custom designed on the same premises. In a lengthy stint as head jewellery designer at Royal de Versailles, Ms. Briatico designed fine jewellery for some of Canada's most distinguished business and community leaders. Isabella's 16-year reputation for excellence ensures that your custom jewellery needs will receive the same care and attention to detail as a couture wedding gown.

Exquisite bridal and evening wear, custom-designed jewellery, and a full range of accessories under one roof: it's all part of the Tricia Cochran experience.

Accessories includes headpieces, shoes, bags, and whatever else you need to make your outfit complete. And rest assured that the experts at Tricia Cochran won't rest until you're looking your absolute best, from head to toe.

Gown on display at ROM

One of Tricia Cochran's greatest honours was being asked by the curator of the Royal Ontario Museum to display one of her couture evening gowns. It is now on permanent display at the ROM, and was selected because it is a fine example of contemporary couture. You can expect more of the same at this leading-edge salon, with personal service to match.

A Tricia Cochran bride once said, "Tricia Cochran is the best thing that ever happened to a bridal gown." Today, this statement remains as true as ever.

William F. Bell

"It is said that history will repeat itself if we do not learn from it and that underlines the need for awareness. Holocaust Education Week is designed to promote an acute awareness through many programs and initiatives which will be held in synagogues, schools, libraries, and churches throughout our various communities. The members of Council are proud and honoured to commend UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for its great endeavours in the name of lasting peace."

Sincerely,

William F. Bell

PROCLAMATION

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK

October 27 – November 10, 2001

WHEREAS: during this 21st annual Holocaust Education Week it is important that we honour the memory of the millions of men, women and children who perished and suffered during the Holocaust; and

WHEREAS: to avoid a repetition of history, it is essential that we educate our children to learn the lessons of the past and develop a deeper understanding of their responsibility for the future; and

WHEREAS: these unimaginable horrors must never be repeated and only through remembrance, education and understanding of the Holocaust can public awareness be heightened and anti-Semitism, racism and prejudice eliminated.

NOW
THEREFORE: I, Mayor Mel Lastman, on behalf of Toronto City Council and the 2.5 million people of our great city, do hereby proclaim October 27 - November 10, 2001 as "Holocaust Education Week." It is with pride and honour that we applaud The Holocaust Centre of Toronto and UJA Federation for raising awareness of this horrendous time in history, and for their tireless efforts to curb racism and prejudice.

Mayor

"On behalf of the town of Markham, I am pleased to show our support for Holocaust Education Week, coordinated by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation. This annual education week allows us time to reflect on the atrocities of the past and strengthen our resolve to eliminate racial and religious discrimination from our lives. This week we honour the memory of millions who perished and suffered during the Holocaust. By remembering the past we hope to build a better future for all."

It is with great pleasure that I invite you to participate in the 21st annual Holocaust Education Week, co-ordinated by The Holocaust Centre of Toronto. A wide array of outstanding programs is again being offered to afford you the opportunity to explore and examine many different aspects of the Holocaust.

This year has been an important one for the Centre. It underwent a recent renaming, and now comprises three distinct and equally important components: The Jacob Israeli and David Smuschkowitz Holocaust Museum, The Anita Ekstein Holocaust Resource Library and The Robby Engel Memorial Lounge.

It is gratifying to see more and more people making use of our services. This year has indeed been a busy one. Apart from the usual visits by groups of students and others, the 21st Annual Student Seminar was a great success and the Annual Provincial Essay Writing Competition elicited over eighty entries, many of an exceptionally high standard. At our Volunteer Appreciation event, it was a pleasure to pay tribute to all those who give of their time to help with our many activities. We are particularly indebted to our survivor speakers, our most cherished resource, for sharing their horrific experiences so that today's youth may learn from them.

With the opening of our Resource Library and the inauguration of the Latner Program for Holocaust and Genocide Studies, a joint endeavour between the Centre and OISE/University of Toronto, we expect the Centre to become even busier.

I would like to congratulate and thank Barbara Rusch and her committee for their passion and commitment in providing a superb roster of events for this year's Holocaust Education Week. I do hope that you will avail yourselves of the opportunity to attend as many programs as possible and to visit the Centre during the year.

UJA FEDERATION CAMPAIGN 2002

ISRAELNOW AND FOREVER

In Canada, we live a secure and full life as Jews and as a Jewish community. We are protected by an enlightened parliamentary and judicial system and by our neighbours to the south who share our values and our worldview. However, we are part of a larger Jewish people and, as the recent terrorist tragedy in the United States demonstrates, we cannot afford to become complacent. Canadian Jewry has a responsibility to be vigilant and to act in response to the intolerance and terror being perpetrated around the world.

Some of us, perhaps, had become complacent as hate and violence were manifested against others. However, with the terrorist attacks in the United States, the experience of the so-called "intifada" and the recent UN racism conference in South Africa, we are witnessing the resurgence of terror and anti-Semitism. The enemies of truth, peace and freedom are projecting their intolerance and terror onto the Jewish people, the State of Israel and the world.

Since the Shoah, the Jewish community's response has been to remember, to teach the lessons of history and to act. Holocaust Education Week, which occurs during the annual UJA Federation campaign, is our annual opportunity to remember and to teach. The connection between Holocaust Education Week and Campaign 2002 – Israel Now and Forever – is especially significant as we remember the past and raise funds for the future of Israel at a time of crisis.

Let us take this challenge to remember the lessons of the Shoah and to stand together with the State of Israel as an opportunity for our community to declare, Never Again!

Alan Sandler
President
UJA FEDERATION

Milestones always seem like an appropriate moment for taking stock – an opportunity to remember the past, assess the present and plan for the future. 2001 marks the twenty-first year of Holocaust Education Week, a kind of coming of age of an annual event that has become an important tradition on the city's calendar, and a perfect occasion to reflect on how far we've come and how much we have yet to accomplish.

In 1980 Holocaust Education Week consisted of a mere handful of programs, mostly survivor speakers, though many survivors were stlll reluctant to submit their painful memories to public scrutiny. The brochure was a single-page flyer, not widely distributed, so what programs there were reached a very limited audience.

Today, though fewer in number, many survivors have recovered their voice and are anxious to share their experiences with a generation that is already in danger of forgetting what their grandparents and millions of others suffered and lost. Those who recall their own personal experiences remain our greatest resource, though our programs have expanded and diversified significantly to two full weeks of musical tributes and dramatic presentations, films, exhibits and other cultural events, lectures with an academic or historical perspective, in addition to remarkable accounts of terror, courage and survival that are only just coming to light.

This year's brochure, listing over one hundred programs taking place in synagogues, churches, libraries, book stores, schools and community venues, is distributed to over fifty thousand people in the Toronto area, and will include something for every interest and age group.

As we plan for the future, we look to a third generation to whom we will pass the torch of memory when those who lived through the terrible events of another century are no longer able to carry it. Once again we invite you to participate in an extraordinary program of remembrance and commemoration.

I would like to thank Howard Driman for his invaluable assistance and encouragement and the members of my committee for their outstanding commitment and enthusiasm. We would also like to express our appreciation to all the participating organizations for their generosity of time and resources. A special debt of gratitude is due to Mary Siklos and the staff of The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation.

THE CHRISTIAN-JEWISH DIALOGUE OF TORONTO

2 Carlton Street
Suite 800
Toronto, Ont.
(416) 586-4242

It is the privilege and the responsibility of Christian Jewish Dialogue of Toronto, through its Holocaust Remembrance Committee, to coordinate the participation of Christian churches during Holocaust Education Week. From a beginning of just a few churches not many years ago, this participation grew to over thirty separate programs. The very success of this effort contributed to an overcrowded schedule of activities during Holocaust Education Week.

This year our committee attempted to deal with this issue by suggesting that neighbouring churches jointly sponsor a program. A number of them have done so, and the result is that thirty churches are involved in fourteen programs.

A second goal of our committee this year was to focus on youth. We are very grateful for the participation of the young people who have had the moving experience of participating in the March of the Living and the Interfaith Mission to Poland. In the March of the Living, they visit Holocaust sites in Poland, including a walk along the railroad line that carried victims from Auschwitz to the death camp of Birkenau. Non-Jewish youth, in this case survivors of the attempted genocide in Rwanda, have a similar experience in the Interfaith Mission to Poland.

We have asked these young people to share their experience and help the rest of us to not only learn about the past, but to reflect on its meaning for the present and the future. The Holocaust is neither the only nor the most recent attempted genocide and its lessons are crucial for all of humanity.

The Main Event of Christian Jewish Dialogue of Toronto for Holocaust Education Week is a program combining music and discussion celebrating the renewal of Jewish life in Germany since the Holocaust. We are proud to present the music of the Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir, which sang in Nuremberg, Germany for last year's commemoration of Kristallnacht. They will be joined by a distinguished panel, which will give us insight into the present conditions of Jewish life in Germany.

We are grateful to The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation, which so graciously welcomes Christian participation in this significant event. It is indeed education for all of us who live in Toronto.

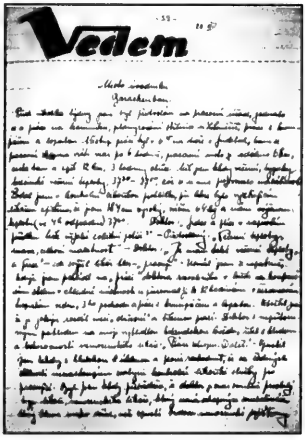
"WE ARE CHILDREN JUST THE SAME"

SRUL IRVING GLICK, the highly acclaimed creator of Holocaust-inspired music, offers a compelling and evocative tribute to the boys of Terezin concentration camp. Poems from their secret magazine Vedem form the text of Mr. Glick's latest song cycle We Are Children Just the Same. Many of the children who composed and published these exceptional writings did not survive the Shoah.



Vedem

Tenor CANTOR BENJAMIN MAISSNER, pianist CECILIA IGNATIEFF and cellist STEFAN GLICK perform along with Mr. Glick. Special guests include GEORGE BRADY, one of the few survivors of Terezin originally involved in creating Vedem, and instrumental in publishing the book We Are Children Just the Same, translated from the Czech by PAUL WILSON.

Musical illustrations from Mr. Glick's earlier song cycle I Never Saw Another Butterfly, composed in 1968 for Maureen Forrester, will also be performed.

Srul Glick has received numerous awards for his music and humanitarian work. He wrote the music for the documentary Out of the Depths shown at The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, and has for many years composed and arranged music for such Holocaust remembrance programs as the Cultural Evening of the Gathering of Holocaust Survivors in Ottawa in 1985.

This program is generously co-sponsored by the Abraham and Ida Moncik Memorial Fund for Holocaust Education.

"MEDICINE AND THE THIRD REICH: PAST, PRESENT & FUTURE"

DR. WILLIAM SEIDELMAN is an internationally-noted expert on the history of medicine in the Third Reich and the continuing legacy arising from that epoch. Professor Emeritus of Family and Community Medicine at the University of Toronto, he is presently Attending Physician at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and Academic Medical Advisor to the Holocaust Resource Project at Baycrest.

The past two decades have seen continuing revelations on the pervasive role played by the German medical profession in the crimes of the Third Reich, including the use of body parts by leading institutions in Germany and Austria. Given the secrecy and cover-up concerning the role of medicine during this period, it is likely that there will be continuing exposés for many decades to come. Dr. Seidelman will discuss the need for a moral framework to address the issues raised by these revelations - a framework that will guide us in addressing how we view future disclosures.

"PUTTING WORDS TO THE HOLOCAUST: A TEACHER AND HIS STUDENTS ENCOUNTER THE SHOAH IN POLAND"

In May of 2001, Professor Wolff led a group of journalism students from across the U.S. on a trip to Poland. His contingent was part of a larger group of students and leaders, mostly non-Jewish, from around the world. During their visit, Professor Wolff hoped to help his students find ways to write about the Holocaust, but in the process, discovered a great deal about himself.

Professor Wolff will be joined in his presentation by a number of Rwandan students, currently living in Canada, who also took part. They will discuss how their encounter with the Holocaust in Poland helped them cope with their own losses during the 1994 Rwandan genocide.

Community Commemoration of Kristallnacht

"FROM HOLOCAUST TO HAVEN"

DR. RUTH GRUBER, noted author, photo-journalist and foreign correspondent has chronicled some of the most important events of the 20th century. Many of her remarkable experiences have been described in her highly-acclaimed books, some of which have been adapted into popular documentary and TV productions.

This year, CBS-TV aired a four-hour mini-series based on Dr. Gruber's book Haven: The Dramatic Story of 1,000 World War II Refugees. The well-received series told the true story of how, while the Holocaust raged, Dr. Gruber was sent on a secret mission to bring 1,000 Jews – the only refugees saved by the U.S. during World War II - to safe haven in Oswego, New York.

Dr. Gruber will describe her unique experiences during World War II and her subsequent eyewitness accounts of the birth and growth of Israel.

This evening will also commemorate the 63rd anniversary of Kristallnacht, The Night of Broken Glass.

On November 9-10, 1938, a massive, coordinated attack was carried out against Jews throughout Germany. Hundreds were killed or injured, synagogues burned, businesses destroyed, cemeteries and schools vandalized and thousands of Jews arrested and sent to concentration camps.

"In Berlin...fire engines stood by to protect the nearby main post office while the Oranienburgstrasse synagogue burned." Photo – Kristallnacht: the Nazi night of terror by Anthony Read and David Fisher. Published by Random House.

A candlelighting ceremony will be held with the assistance of Rabbi Berman and Cantor Harel of Shaar Shalom Synagogue.

This program is generously co-sponsored by The Sharon Diamond and Walt Family Fund and Shaar Shalom Synagogue, in loving memory of Sharon B. Diamond and Isidore J. Walt.

"THE HOLOCAUST IN GREECE: THE PERSECUTED AND THE RESCUERS"

The Jewish Museum of Greece, in coordination with the Ministry of Press and Mass Media, has created a special photographic exhibition about the Holocaust in Greece. Very little is known about this subject and, through this presentation, the Museum seeks to make the public aware of the history of the Holocaust in Greece as well as to preserve the memory of its victims. Along with the tragic decimation of the Greek Jewish communities, there are remarkable accounts of the heroism and altruism of Greek Christians who saved their Jewish compatriots. His Excellency Leonidas Chrysanthopoulos, Greek Ambassador to Canada, will attend the exhibit. Dessert reception will follow. Starts at 8:00 pm.

'Arafat facing moment of truth'

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

A month after the terrorist attacks in the United States, we can conclude that the Palestinian opposition groups (including Hezbollah and its associates) lowered their heads only for a short while.

Commentary

They have re-evaluated the situation and have concluded that they must resume the offensive.

Last week, the attacks began along the Green Line – a booby-trapped car in the Talpiot neighbourhood of Jerusalem, shooting at an Israeli car north of the capital, firing against an IDF force along the Green Line near Bat Hefer – and advanced to the more audacious attack against Alei Sinai.

The next step along this path was predictable: an attack in the centre of Afula last Thursday, well inside the Green Line. One tactic has not yet resumed: a return to suicide bombings. It is possible that Hamas and Islamic Jihad still believe that the time is not right to carry out such attacks because of their chronological proximity to the attacks against the United States.

More than 120 terror incidents in one week

But when the message to the Palestinians from Washington is so unclear, so lacking in firmness and intensity, it is fair to assume that the suicide attacks also will not be long in coming.

What is clear is that frustration is growing in the defence establishment as a result of the American approach, both because of their forgiving attitude to Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, and in the broader sense, because of the contacts being made for the involvement of Syria and Iran in a coalition against terrorism.

The IDF has counted more than 120 incidents initiated by the Palestinians since the ceasefire was declared: five Israelis dead in Alei Sinai and Afula, and 30 injured.

This count also includes the shooting attacks against Jews praying at the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron.

A continuation of the attacks, as well as their growing audacity, and the public funeral that the Hamas organized for those carrying out the attacks against Alei Sinai, attended by masses of supporters, suggest that the "opposition" Palestinian groups are presenting Arafat with a challenge.

At the Defence Ministry, decision-makers believe that Arafat is quickly approaching the moment of truth. This is a situation in which he will have to confront head-on Hamas, the Islamic Jihad and even the opposition among the ranks of his own Fatah organization, so that he can safeguard his own rule and avoid a much more difficult clash with Israel. Such a confrontation will involve mass arrests and taking a firmer stance with the Dawa, the civilian infrastructure of the Islamic organizations.

But for now, it seems that Arafat is in no rush. He has refused to arrest any of the 108 activists named by Israel on a wanted list presented to him.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Letter to Museum

OTTAWA — In a letter to Dr. John English, chair of the board of trustees of the Canadian Museum of Civilization, Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy urged the museum to proceed with caution on elements of a Canadian art exhibit alleged to promote hatred against Americans and Israelis.

Doug Collins Dies

VANCOUVER — Doug Collins, the retired newspaper columnist whose writings were once ruled anti-Semitic, died Sept. 29. He was 81. In 1997, Collins won a case before the B.C. Human Rights Tribunal brought by Canadian Jewish Congress concerning a Collins column that questioned the extent of the Holocaust and attacked the film Schindler's List. In 1999, another tribunal ordered Collins and the North Shore News to pay Victoria businessman Harry Abrams $2,000 for exposing Jews to hatred through four of Collins' articles.

ISRAEL

Trees Planted

JERUSALEM — Eighteen trees have been planted in a memorial forest outside Jerusalem for victims of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Some 300 schoolchildren, Israel's Ashkenazi chief rabbi and Jewish National Fund officials took part in the ceremony, the first planting since the end of the shmittah, or sabbatical year, when trees are not planted in Israel.

'Stronger' Uprising

JERUSALEM — Radical Palestinian groups meeting in Syria have called attempts to bolster an Israeli-Palestinian ceasefire a waste of time. The Palestinian "uprising will continue and get stronger," promised Ahmed Jibril, head of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine – General Command.

Sharon Probe

JERUSALEM — Israel's attorney general, Elyakim Rubinstein, has been asked to probe Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's 2001 campaign fundraising tactics. The prime minister's son and adviser, Omri, may have violated the law by allegedly receiving more than $1 million funneled to the Likud party by a company established by Sharon's lawyer.

WORLD

Threats to Jews

ZAGREB — Two Croatian Jewish communities recently received letters calling on Jews to leave the country or be "cleansed." The letters sent to the communities of Zagreb and Osijek read: "You Jews should know that as Zionists and CIA spies you are not welcome in Croatia, so you should leave."

Ad Praises

NEW YORK — The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations ran a full-page advertisement in major newspapers honouring the work of President George W. Bush, New York Gov. George Pataki and New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani in the aftermath of the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The ad quoted Deuteronomy, and read "Chazak V'Amatz," translated as "Be strong and of good courage."

New JTA President

NEW YORK — Ivan Schaeffer, a prominent volunteer and philanthropist, has been named the new president of the Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA), a wire service that serves as a leading source of news, analysis and feature stories for 120 Jewish publications (including The CJN) and Web sites around the world. Schaeffer succeeds Shoshana Cardin.

Manley Raps Arafat's Prisoner Release

OTTAWA — Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley has sharply criticized Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat for releasing Islamic extremists from jail who have carried out suicide bombings and other terrorist acts in Israel.

In a series of interviews, Manley pledged Canada's "unambiguous" support for the United States in the "war against terrorism." On Global Television, Manley condemned the terror campaign against Israel, citing Arafat's decision to empty his jails of more than 300 Palestinian extremists.

"It is unacceptable that people who have been associated with terrorist attacks should be allowed to go free," Manley said. "That is one of the messages that we and others have been delivering very clearly to the Palestinian Authority over the last few months. We have called on Chairman Arafat to make explicit his denunciation of terrorism and his belief that the issues in his region need to be settled peacefully."

BB calls on Concordia to act on student handbook

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Concordia University must see what legal steps can be taken to address the fact that this year's Concordia Student Union (CSU) Agenda (handbook) glorifies violence, incites hatred and advocates civil disobedience, leaders of B'nai Brith Canada said at an Oct. 1 news conference.

The 312-page handbook, published by the CSU and distributed free to students – although paid for through student dues – this year is entitled Uprising.

The first page includes this quote:"intifada, out of your houses and into the streets; intifada here [sic] the calls, the cries, the voices screaming; drums beating; pulse of your body… take arms for revolution…"

Although the publication went to press before the Sept. 11 terrorist attack in New York, BBC spokespersons said it has to be seen in the context of the attack's aftermath.

The handbook contains drawings of planes plowing into a boardroom filled with businesspeople. The calendar inside, under the May 15 date, refers to that date being, "Al-Nakba (the 1948 Palestinian catastrophe)."

The handbook also calls on readers to steal for "empowerment," and depicts an F-16 fighter plane with a Star of David on it terrorizing a Palestinian.

Elsewhere, July 1, Canada Day, is referred to as a day to "burn the flag."

"Following the terrible events of Sept. 11, we must seek to remain calm, but avoid the risk of being complacent," said BBC president Rochelle Wilner.

At Concordia, she said, "the gauntlet has been thrown down," with the handbook's "open call to violence and civil disobedience."

BBC's executive vice-president, Frank Dimant, called the handbook, "a call to arms, to intifadah, to anarchy and to revolution," and a potential blueprint for campuses across North America. "Is this the blueprint for Osama bin Laden's youth program in North America?"

The handbook is the latest issue to place Concordia in a storm of controversy. The university is considered by some to be the most fervent hotbed for pro-Palestinian campus activities in Canada, especially since the intifadah began a year ago.

Although the great majority of students do not appear to be involved in the CSU (only about 10 percent of the student body voted in the elections), Palestinian activists have been elected to the CSU leadership and Jewish students say they have been made to feel intimidated and threatened by the anti-Zionist and even anti-Jewish climate on campus.

Earlier this year, a small percentage of Concordia students narrowly voted in favour of a referendum calling on Israel to withdraw from all occupied territories.

Patrick Essiminy, Quebec regional chair of BBC's Institute for International Affairs, called the handbook an "open call to anarchy and violence."

He also said the book contains a "potentially libellous diatribe" in the article by CSU internal vice-president, Laith Malouf, who was recently expelled ffom Concordia for spray-painting pro-Palestinian slogans on university property.

In his article titled Arabophobia, Malouf writes that "the majority of Canadian media is owned by two Zionists, Conrad Black… and Israel Asper."

The same article also refers to Concordia rector Frederick Lowy and provost Jack Lightstone as being Jewish.

The publication, Essiminy said, crossed "any acceptable limit" of free speech by openly advocating stealing.

In reply to reporters' questions, Dimant said he expected the university to be more proactive in the wake of the handbook's publication by exploring what legal avenues can be taken to deal with extremist elements on campus.

That would include examining what legal authorities such as the police, RCMP and immigration officials could do in terms of permitting such elements to advocate violence and illegal activities.

In an open letter to university supporters written on Sept. 21, Lowy said that because the CSU is a separate legal entity, the university has no legal authority over its activities.

But he did say the handbook contained,"a great many inflammatory and possible libellous statements about the university, university officials and some of the companies that employ our graduates and support the university."

Worrisome signs of déjà vu

From the editor's desk

It is hard to avoid the worrisome feeling that we have seen this international morality play before, some 10 years ago to be precise. And it is a play whose script is obscene.

Once again the U.S. is cobbling together a coalition of forces to wage war against a Middle East-based foe.

Ten years ago the target was the despot Saddam Hussein. To ensure the involvement, such as it was, of other Arab states in the coalition 10 years ago, president George Bush pressured Israel not only to keep a low profile in the ensuing military campaign, but to abstain from any measures of pre-emptive self-defence or retaliation should it be attacked by Hussein. Of course, Israel was attacked, numerous times. And, surprisingly to many, it did not respond militarily to Saddam's rain of more than 40 SCUD missiles into the heartland of the Jewish state.

The aftermath of the war against Saddam led to the Madrid conference. The aftermath of the Madrid conference led to the disappointing and now expired Oslo peace process.

Today the target is the master terrorist Osama bin Laden and his sinister network of terrorists, Al Qaeda. Remarkably, President George W. Bush appears to be replicating the very same morally indefensible policies of his father that placed Israel in an untenable security situation.

To ensure the involvement, such as it may be, of other Arab states in his unfolding coalition, Bush is also pressuring Israel.

Like his father, he too is demanding that Israel keep a low profile in the unfolding developments. But he is also browbeating Israel into adopting a much more positive posture towards Yasser Arafat than the facts warrant, conscience allows or self-interest dictates.

Reports are now circulating that in the days after the Sept. 11 atrocities, Crown Prince Abdullah of Saudi Arabia warned Bush, in the words of the Forward, that if Israel took any punitive steps against Palestinian forces, "the entire Arab world would unite against Washington... [and]... the future of of moderate pro-American regimes such as those in Riyadh, Cairo or Amman would be seriously jeopardized."

Bush was persuaded.

He thus re-established the unjustifiable linkage between Israel's conflict with the Palestinians and the American-led campaign against terror.

Much worse, however, Bush has effectively made Yasser Arafat, of all people, the centre stone holding together the arch of so-called moderate Arab participation in the coalition.

The first result of Bush's strategy was to force Ariel Sharon to allow Shimon Peres to meet with Arafat last month.

In a telephone conversation three weeks ago described by Israeli newspapers as "difficult" and "unpleasant," Bush foisted his demands upon Sharon. "Mr. Sharon was said to be surprised," the Forward wrote, "at the stark American insistence, delivered by President Bush in a reportedly heated conversation with the prime minister that Israel go ahead with plans for a meeting between Arafat and Peres."

As we know, the meeting did take place and a "ceasefire" was announced. But the Palestinians have not ceased firing: car bombs, drive-by shootings, sniper fire and an assault against the residents of Alei Sinai. Israelis and Palestinians have been killed; many more have been wounded.

Arafat disingenuously and fraudulently condemns acts of violence and terrorism committed by Hamas, Islamic Jihad or Hezbollah and his Palestinian security forces, all of whom he controls or chooses not to control, as confirmed recently by a PA official.

As of this writing, the government of Israel has suspended its compliance with the terms of the Sept. 26 ceasefire, reconferring on the IDF the right to take appropriate measures in defence of Israeli citizens.

The implications of the unfolding American policy are alarming. Bush has now discarded his original high, moral principle in favour of self-deluding, base expedience.

The contemptible expression of that expedience could be heard last week in the halls of the General Assembly at the United Nations during its hastily convened debate on international terrorism.

Arab representatives urged the world to "understand the terrorists' grievances." As the spokesperson from the United States' close ally, Saudi Arabia, said: "The general condemnation of terrorism extends to state terrorism as practised by Israel continuously... and armed resistance to colonialism, racism and foreign occupation is a legitimate struggle sustained by the principle of self-determination."

Alas, Bush has effectively adopted their vile argument; he has differentiated the terror aimed last month at the U.S. from the terror still being aimed at Israel.

Sensing that the Bush administration was about to weigh in against Israel, Sharon told a teleconference of community leaders and reporters last month that Arab countries were demanding concessions of Israel as a price for their joining America's new coalition. He then stated: "We are not going to pay a price for this coalition. We cannot do it."

But he has already been forced to do so. At some point, however, Sharon will draw the line. It is inconceivable that, he will acquiesce to Israel's heightened vulnerability without recourse to an active Israeli defence.

Web site's guerrilla art addresses intifadah

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The renewal of violence by the Palestinians last September, just weeks after Israel reportedly offered unprecedented concessions at the failed Camp David peace summit, shocked many Jews. Even more disconcerting was the feeling that many in the international media appeared to be taking the Palestinian side.

To Israel's supporters, the media seemed to be awash in reportage that placed the blame for the conflict squarely on the Jewish state, while painting the Palestinians as righteous victims.

Many people were upset, but few felt they could do anything about it. Not Michaele Jordana. A multi-talented artist with a painting in the National Gallery of Canada, Jordana decided she could not simply sit back and let what she considered to be the one-sided portrayal of the conflict play out without responding.

Not long after the intifadah erupted, Jordana and her partner Douglas Pringle, along with a silent partner, launched Project One Soul (www.projectonesoul.com), a Toronto-based Web site dedicated to presenting an alternative interpretation of the Mideast conflict.

Employing her artist's eye and sensibility, the Winnipeg native crafted a Web site that combines stunning visual images with brief, but power-packed, commentaries in a form she calls "guerrilla art." The images are arranged so as to be viewed consecutively in a way that conveys the artist's interpretation of events of the day. The result is a powerful and emotionally gripping exposition that serves as an antidote to what many see as the banal dichotomy of Palestinians as victims and Israelis as victimizers served up in many media outlets.

The site has proven wildly popular, registering five million "hits," or visits, since it was launched about one year ago. In one two-week span last November, at the height of the intifadah, the site's server recorded 626,456 hits. Early in the site's existence, it was regularly getting 5,000 hits per hour.

It has clearly struck a chord, and Jordana believes that is attributable to her artistic approach. "The Web site is unlike any Web site in that it evokes an emotional response," she says.

"It is a narrative," chimes in Pringle. "The problem with most information is that it's random. This is not random."

Jordana describes the design of the site as "like a symphony in five movements that builds. Each movement has a theme. The final theme is humanity at its lowest."

Many photos on the site depict the suffering of Israelis at the hands of Palestinians, including the "barbaric" exultation of killers who lynched two Israeli soldiers in Ramallah and the frightening frenzy that led killers to mutilate the bodies of Jewish teens in a West Bank cave.

"I'm not just showing the terror," Jordana says. "What sets us apart from other groups is the juxtaposition of the terror with the images of Israeli citizens who have been so deeply affected by the deaths at the hands of terrorists... People have to, even if it's for a brief moment, get inside the skin of a Jewish person."

Jordana reports that since she and Pringle launched the Web site, she has received thousands of letters of support from around the world. She has been invited to attend a conference in Washington, sponsored by AIPAC, the U.S. Jewish community's pro-Israel lobby group, and she has received letters from students at Berkeley and Concordia University asking for her help in countering heavy pro-Palestinian propaganda on their campuses.

The site packs such a powerful punch that fans of the site have, without being asked or paid, translated it into French and Spanish.

How being a better citizen makes you a better Jew.

FROM THE TALMUD to Harav Joseph Dov Soloveitchik and from early responsa to Harav Moshe Feinstein, obeying the law of the land has been a basic halachic principle.

Yes, there have been host countries that decreed corrupt and unjust laws. It was a halachic and moral obligation to ignore them.

And yes, when government law contradicts halachic ritual, there's no question which is supreme.

But we live in a great democracy. And we can't allow past tyranny, however painful, to affect halacha's clear directive to obey the law of the land.

In Canada, religious freedom is not only tolerated, it's guaranteed by the government.

We are provided with financial incentives for our charitable gifts to tzedakot and yeshivot. Our mikvaot, cemeteries and synagogues are protected. Even our batei din are recognized by the civil courts of the land.

We stand on guard for thee

Laws regulating our businesses, real estate, finances, health and safety allow us to fulfill our obligation to strengthen society. And Jews in Canada depend on the law of the land for their safety and security.

Imagine if each individual or group selectively decided which laws to ignore.

Over the course of these weeks and months in Toronto, the theme of Dina De'Malchuta Dina will be the subject of intense study, discussion, and introspection in a variety of settings. Jews of all ages will participate in programs, classes and assemblies, lectures, and workshops.

This initiative is occurring under the umbrella of the S. Daniel Abraham and Ira L. Rennert Torah Ethics Project of the Orthodox Caucus and its associated Lili & William Goldberg Resource Library for Ethical Education.

The goal is to make us all more aware of our civic responsibilities as individuals and as a community.

Supporting our government and upholding our laws is a halachic imperative. That's why obeying them makes you more than just a good citizen.

It makes you a better Jew.

Construction starts on non-profit housing project

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Construction is due to begin on Trellis Gardens, a non-profit housing development geared to the needs of women and children.

The $3.9-million project is a partnership between the Reconstructionist synagogue Congregation Darchei Noam and the City of Toronto's Let's Build program, which helps build affordable housing.

Trellis Gardens, to be located on Lawrence Avenue W. near the Allen Expressway, will house 55 people when completed, with most coming from Toronto shelters.

Construction was scheduled to begin last week, said Valerie Elliot-Hyman, chair of Darchei Noam's social action committee.

Elliot-Hyman said the committee has always been concerned with homelessness and housing. In 1995 it put up Moshav Noam, a 133-unit co-op apartment building on Lawrence Avenue W.

"That was when there was [both] federal and provincial funding, [before] the provincial government got out of the business of funding social housing."

Following that, she said, the committee started working with the homeless, and now, together with St. Peter's Roman Catholic Church, runs an interfaith Out of the Cold program.

> 'There is a huge, desperate need for affordable housing'

When the City of Toronto was looking for a not-for-profit group to participate in its Let's Build program, Darchei Noam was chosen over nine other submissions, Elliot-Hyman said.

"We are a project that demonstrates public/private partnership. The city has donated the site, provided a second mortgage, given us a capital grant, and waived certain fees. We then had to raise $400,000."

The funds were raised over the course of about two years from corporate sponsors, the Zwig Family Foundation and the federal government's Supporting Communities Partnership Initiative (SCPI).

"[In Toronto], there are 170,000 households waiting for housing. Of those, 1,629 households are top priority – homeless, victims of violence or refugees.

"Trellis Gardens will target 17 units for families who are currently underhoused and living on the Kingston Road motel strip, and seven units will be at market value, so we are looking at a mixed income community," Elliot-Hyman said.

"There is a huge, desperate need for affordable housing, and when you think about it, we are putting in a lot of time and effort to provide 24 housing units. That is such a tiny amount when you consider the need, but by this time next year, about 55 women and children will have housing that do not have it now."

There will be a tenant selection committee, Elliot-Hyman said, "but we will not have a lot of choice because of the huge number of people who are desperately in need. We will have a little choice over those paying market value, but there is already a waiting list."

She said that Trellis Gardens will differ from the Moshav Noam co-op, in that the committee plans to run programs for the residents.

"Our experience tells us that people who have been underhoused or homeless for long periods of time need a lot of assistance getting back into the mainstream and feeling that they can make a contribution to society.

"We plan to offer parenting, budgeting and life skills, and addiction counselling if necessary; there will also be a community garden and a community kitchen," Elliot-Hyman said.

"We're hoping to develop a community. We want to develop more than just bricks and mortar. We want to help people feel safe and secure and be able to make a contribution to their community at large."

It is permanent housing, she said, "but people may not want to stay there forever. If they feel that they are back on their feet and they want to move on, we will give them as much help as we can."

The committee chose the name Trellis House, Elliott-Hyman said, "because we wanted a name that would represent growth and support. A trellis gives support and enables growth."

Deeds that distort the meaning of words

The day before the ceasefire agreement was brokered between Shimon Peres and Yasser Arafat two weeks ago, the leader of the Fatah movement in the West Bank, Hussein Sheikh, stated that "Arafat is in full control of all the organizations operating in the territories. All the factions," Sheikh emphasized, "Fatah, Hamas, Islamic Jihad, all of them."

It was one of those unguarded moments when bravado overtook guile and the truth was spoken.

But it appears no government other than the government of Israel took notice. For no government other than the Israeli government attempts to hold Yasser Arafat to account for the utter prevarication that is his ceasefire, for his mendacious, murderous behaviour.

The ceasefire was agreed to on Sept. 26. The very next day Palestinian gunmen were shooting at Israelis and they have been shooting at Israelis each day since then without relent. Arafat's aides disavowed any involvement by their chairman in the new violence.

Despite the very public proclamation by PA officials of a ceasefire, "the shooting has not stopped even for one day," Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told a press conference last week, just hours after three Israelis were killed in Afula in yet another act of terror.

Arafat may speak the words of ceasefire, but his deeds distort its meaning. Yet, remarkably, no western government takes him to task for the obviously dishonest double game he plays with Israel and with the West. But Israel will because Israel must. That is why Prime Minister Sharon also told the press conference, "We can only trust ourselves and from this day forth, we will only trust ourselves."

Words that distort the meaning of deeds

The Concordia Student Union recently published a beginning-of-year handbook that seriously calls into question the activities and motives of the students responsible for the publication. At best mischievous, at worst malign, the handbook calls upon students to, among other things,"take arms for revolution" and "to burn the flag."

These words may not be dangerous in the literal sense: but nor are they merely youthfully innocent. This odious material should be rejected by the other students on campus as a tear in the fabric of tolerance in which our universities have traditionally been clothed. We note that the Graduate Students' Association has condemned the handbook. In addition, the students responsible for the handbook should be cast out by their peers from their leadership positions.

The prime minister's priorities

Many Canadians have wondered why our prime minister waited so long before visiting the scene of the devastation in New York, and why over the past few weeks, he seemed more concerned with a number of despicable, but nonetheless isolated, racist acts in Canada than with the fact that terrorists murdered almost 7,000 innocent victims and turned lower Manhattan into a crematorium.

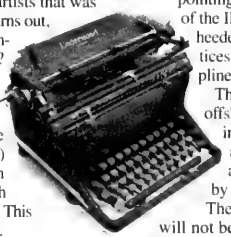
The Liberal party is a machine with one goal: to stay permanently in power. To do so it tries to cater to the whims and desires of as many ethnic and religious pressure groups as possible. (The party terms this "multiculturalism.")

Could this also perhaps explain why he was so busy criticizing the Museum of Civilization in Ottawa for postponing an exhibit of Arab Canadian artists that was to open Oct. 19 – an exhibit which, it turns out, included, according to news reports, "inflammatory" and "offensive" materials? (One commissioned work included a taped interview with a Palestinian woman who claimed that the Americans were supplying weapons to the Israelis to test on women and children.)



On the other hand, Jean Chrétien doesn't have to concern himself with Americans: they aren't Canadian voters. This is a man who knows how to prioritize.

Say it with a fatwa

Muslims at large should in no way be collectively blamed for terrorist attacks, past or present. Guilt by association runs squarely against justice and against civilized behaviour. The West learned this lesson a long time ago, and most recently after the horrors of the Holocaust.

The vast majority of Muslims denounced the terror attacks which hit the United States last month, and are eager to capture the terrorists and dismantle their deadly networks. We have heard several statements to that effect from Muslim leaders around the world.

But statements are not enough. This is a time for action, in all fronts.

I urge every Muslim imam, whether Sunni or Shiah, to issue a fatwa against the perpetrators of this crime and their supporters. This would be the most unequivocal position for all those who uphold the traditional values of Islam and who do not want their religion to be hijacked by brutal extremists.

Mullahs in Iran did not hesitate to issue a fatwa against Salman Rushdie for having written a book which they considered hostile to Islam. Surely, the deliberate mass killing of thousands of innocent civilians by people who, in all probability, acted in the name of Islam, should be viewed as a flagrant blasphemy of the true faith of Islam.

Article's inclusions too wide

The article on the World YMCA (CJN, Sept. 28) and its anti-Israel Web sites is spoiled by its sweeping inclusion of Peace Now, B'Tselem, and the Arab Association for Human Rights in Israel, as critics and therefore enemies of Israel.

Peace Now is loyal to Israel's founding values, even while it persists in asking for peace moves rather than warlike ones from the present government, as it did from past governments. These are reasonable expressions of dissent within a democracy.

B'Tselem serves as a watchdog for the country in pointing out unlawful practices by some members of the IDF. Many of B'Tselem's reports have been heeded by the army and seen as describing practices contrary to to both police and army discipline.

The Arab Association for Human Rights is an offshoot of ACRI, Association for Civil Rights in Israel. They make their case, if violations are claimed, directly to the Israeli courts; and many of their claims have been upheld by the Supreme Court of Israel.

The counterparts of these three organizations will not be found in any Arab state; their presence speaks to the strength of Israeli democracy.

Autocrats vs. democrats

It will take awhile, but the world will soon realize that the World Trade Center tragedy was the day of awakening to the need for a resolution of the conflict between two distinct political cultures Despotic-Autocracy and Democracy.

It is not surprising that they would choose the epitome of democratic success – the United States – as the prime target of their venomous frustration. It is this type of regime, from Afghanistan to the Palestinian Authority, that produces terrorists and assassins.

The democracies of the world must unite to aid the citizens of these backward regimes achieve a dignified and civilized existence and only then will they be able to protect the future of all progressive societies.

International law is the problem, not the solution

By ED MORGAN
Special to The CJN

The summer of 2001 was not international law's best season. It seems to have taken history's worst act of terrorism to bring international institutions and a majority of states to their senses.

From June through August, the government of Israel was repeatedly condemned by the United Nations for the way it fought back against violent assaults on Israelis at nightclubs, restaurants, shopping malls and highways. The numerous calls for more restrained Israeli rules of engagement have not been matched by a single resolution decrying the loss of Jewish civilian life or condemning the reign of terrorists for undermining the last vestiges of the peace process.

In July, a Belgian court charged the prime minister of Israel with crimes against humanity for a 20 year old massacre of Palestinians committed by Lebanese Christians without the participation of a single Israeli soldier. Neither Elie Hobeika, the Lebanese businessman and former cabinet minister who led the culpable Phalange militiamen, nor anyone else involved in the killings, has ever been indicted or even investigated for the crime.

Then, September saw the UN's foremost conference on anti-racism turn into a forum for unabashed Jew baiting. Syria's representatives advanced the cause of international human rights by engaging in explicit Holocaust denial, while one NGO accredited to the conference – the Arab Lawyers' Union – advocated its version of a liberal society by distributing brochures depicting medieval Jewish caricatures and fresh copies of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

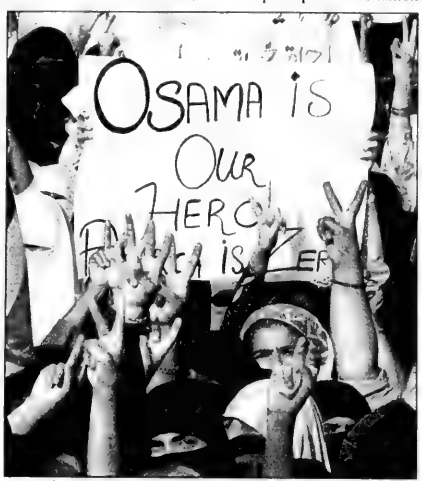
Observers of the international scene might be justified in thanking Mr. bin Laden for finally having reminded the world, in the most twisted possible way, of the difference between right and wrong. For anyone with faith in the rule of law, it seems as though the international system itself has been reduced to the same rubble as the twin towers. How, one might well ask, did a once noble discipline become so perverse?

International law starts from the premise that all states are both sovereign and equal. Although in reality some states have always wielded more political, economic or military power than others, the object of the law is to ensure that no one state can legally dominate another and that each state is equally inviolable. All of the players in the international game are sovereign, but none of them is king.

In fact, so much equality is built into the international system that the system itself can hardly be said to dominate, or govern, the states of the world. This point was brought home in a 1949 case involving the fledgling State of Israel, in which the UN claimed compensation for the death of one of its diplomats – Swedish Count Folke Bernadotte, who mediated the 1948 armistice and drew up the UN's partition plan.

The assassination by members of the Lehi ("Stern Gang") had taken place in an Israeli-held part of Jerusalem. As the territorial government, Israel would have been responsible to any state that the diplomat represented. In finding that the Count was in the service of the UN and that Israel was liable to the UN for the death, the International Court of Justice effectively decided that the world body is on par with its own constituent members as a holder of legal rights.

Since the international system is equal to any of its member states, no state need be subservient to it. In fact, the logic of the law is that the system itself is no more than the sum of its parts. Thus, for example, treaties and custom are the primary sources of international law, and these are dictated by nothing more than the agreements and acts of governments. Each state is free, in other words, to fashion the rules by which it will play the international game.



The practical effect of such a system was brought home, again, in the early days of Israel. The story goes that upon proclaiming Israel's emergence as sovereign state, prime minister David Ben-Gurion refused to identify the country's ultimate borders. Always the pragmatist, Ben-Gurion could see that war loomed ahead and that the question of territory was very much up for grabs. His close advisor was Pinchas Rosen, the new minister of justice and a formalist lawyer of the European school, who lectured him indignantly on the niceties of international rules.

"In all of Prof. Lauterpacht's treatise on international law," Rosen pontificated, "there is not a single sovereign state without a precisely defined territory."

"Wait until the next edition," was Ben-Gurion's famous retort.

It is one thing, of course, for governments to make up the rules of their own game when the ultimate object is to preserve the legal principle that no nation can be subject to another's attack. At the time of Ben-Gurion's flippant remark, Jewish leaders in Palestine had accepted the UN's partition plan, only to be rebuffed by the Arab leadership and attacked by the combined armed forces of half a dozen neighbouring states. Israel's attitude toward the question of territory was asserted in defence of its own sovereignty rather than in opposition to the very concept.

It is quite another thing, however, for self-interested governments to dictate the terms of the law when they are on the giving rather than the receiving end of an attack. Once again, the point was brought home to Israel at an infamous 1976 session of the General Assembly immediately following the successful rescue of hostages at Entebbe airport in Uganda. In a chilling reminder of the worst concentration camp scenes, the Jewish and Israeli hostages had been selected from among the passengers of a hijacked airplane and were held under armed guard by European and Palestinian terrorists together with local Ugandan soldiers. Their airlift to safety by Israeli forces struck a blow against air piracy that lasted almost until Sept. 11.

Ironically for international law, however, the UN convened not to praise the anti-terror operation but to condemn it. As presented by the Ugandan representative and supported by the non-aligned bloc, the pertinent issue was that of Israel's uninvited incursion into Uganda's airspace and territory. In other words, debate boiled down to the singular foundation of all international law: state sovereignty.

It was the law's own logic that led to this bizarre assertion of criminality over humanitarian intervention. In its desire to equalize the voices of the powerful and the weak, international law and institutions have treated every sovereign equally. While the five major powers have vetoes in the Security Council, they possess no weighted votes in the Security Council, or the General Assembly, or in any of the numerous working and adjudicative committees of which the international system is comprised. Egalitarianism is the governing rule.

In a world governed by equally sovereign states and lacking in overarching principles, the articulation of the law is left to the most numerous camp. Unfortunately, the freedom implicit in a system that provides equal protection for every voice can turn rather quickly into its own form of oppression. Under international norms of conduct, states are subject to nothing but their own self-made rules. In the name of equal sovereignty, the many can impose their will on the few.

Where there is smoke, however, there may be salmon. There are early indications from the current war on terrorism that the United States has become clever at playing the international game. The Bush administration has sought a broad coalition to convert its fight into a multilaterally endorsed action along the lines of the 1991 Security Council-sponsored Gulf War. The only point of concern is that the Americans are now so inclusive that they may be willing to consult the likes of Syria and Iran, thereby adopting an internationalist strategy that is too clever by half.

The trick will be to keep the many on side in pursuit of what is right, and to isolate the few who will be tempted to steer the coalition wrong. If those states that aid and abet criminality are themselves part of the coalition, the contradictions inherent in international law will only reemerge in defeat of the multilateral effort. After the summer of 2001, the international community must be on guard against the fall.

Ed Morgan is a professor of international law at the University of Toronto and chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region.

Opinions

Israel and you

A recent article in a U.S. magazine went into some detail describing the way the American Jewish public has reacted to recent events in Israel. The bottom line, it said, was that Jews have been moving away from identification with Israel's fate and the constant reference to strife in the Middle East has encouraged that trend.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Why would this be so? Would one not have the right to expect that, with Israel in obvious trouble from terrorism and economic decline, world Jewry would come to its defence in every way possible, both morally and in every other fashion?

That was the Diaspora's reaction in the past. When things went downhill in Israel, our support increased rather than decreased, as did our identification with the fate of the Jewish State. Why is this different now? Why, instead of by giving support, do we deal with Israel's troubles by withdrawing into silence and standing aside?

I believe that much of this has to do with the way the media – from CNN to printed papers – have coloured their reporting with a clear anti-Israel bias. When Israel reacts to the killing of 15 people by taking some vigorous counter-measure, it is not usually the original massive destruction of civilian life which occupies the headlines, but Israel's response. And headlines are indeed a very important part in this conundrum, for many people never read beyond them. The defence, therefore, that the total content of the broadcast or newspaper article must be considered, is out of place. Headlines are a vital communication factor of their own.

In assessing newspaper reporting, I should make it quite clear that the National Post is an honourable exception. It is impartial in its headlines and treatment of the reports, and in this way – unfortunately – occupies a unique position.

A fairly savvy observer of this unfortunate PR dilemma phrased it in a memorable way. When discussing the downward trend of events, with war on a larger scale a real possibility, he made this judgement: The only way the media will give credit to Israel and put it in a positive light is to fight a war and win it; only then will it enjoy a good year of reportage, unfortunately in addition to the price in human blood that must inevitably be paid.

One would think that getting good and straightforward news coverage is not worth that high an expense, but the idea is nonetheless suggested from time to time.

Some people blame outright anti-Semitism for the imbalance, others target Israeli's ineffective hasbarah (government information services), still others believe that the current trend will prevail as long as Palestinians are seen as underdogs. Truth and fairness evidently do not always count for a lot.

'If I am only for myself, what am I?'

It's the first question man asks of God: "Am I my brother's keeper?" Why am I responsible for the other guy? Hillel taught, "If I am only for myself, what am I?"

In these days of uncertainty, while we wait for answers to the questions arising out of the attacks, it is worth asking what relevance this theme has to these terrible events. After all, why not look out for number one when all hell breaks loose?

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

At the time of this writing, we have learned that many small things led up to the tragedy. One of many was the lack of security at airports. The reason? The security of passengers, if it can be called security, has been entrusted to poorly trained, woefully underpaid staff, employed not by the airlines responsible for their passengers, but by private companies. The idea that government is best when it governs least has become a mantra chanted by companies and all levels of government.

What we have now, in effect throughout North America, is a massive withdrawal of support for the kinds of government oversights that kept us safe at home, safe in the air, safe on the streets, healthy and cared for in hospitals – the list goes on. We seem headed into an era where those least able to protect themselves lose their only public defenders – the state itself. And an era where social services, the environment and future economic development is entrusted solely to the marketplace.

"It's your money," politicians bleat, as they return token amounts to those who can live without it. Thus they would have us answer the question – Am I my brother's keeper? – with a loud no.

Neo-conservatives have scored great victories, not in teaching self-sufficiency so much as preaching abdication of the responsibilities that come with living in a civil and caring society. As if government has no role in our lives. As if we can all pay for complicated medical procedures; guard ourselves from sliding into poverty when we lose our jobs; collect our own garbage, assure safe water and clean air. All entrusted to the marketplace, in effect sending the fox to guard the chickens. We need look no further than Walkerton, where people died as a result of the infatuation with unregulated private enterprises.

Gone are Canada's federal commitments to social housing, to education and (it would seem) to universal, affordable health care. Provincially we trash the nurses and teachers who care for our sick bodies and teach our children. (We in British Columbia will be happy when our minister for post-secondary education graduates from university.)

Jews, prominent in so many fields, shine in the firmament of neo-cons. Let welfare moms work for minimum wage while we promote family ideals. Working poor? Not our brother. Not their keeper.

I was in D.C. right after the attack, and Americans as well as Canadians are generously giving money to support the families traumatized by the deaths of their loved ones. We as individuals do this well in times of stress and sorrow. America is about to spend billions pursuing the perpetrators of Sept.11's slaughter of the innocent. At the same time, both in the United States and in Canada, all levels of government need to regain the understanding that the welfare of their citizens at home is a large part of the reason governments exist. Sodom was destroyed, the midrash goes, because it failed in its duties to both its citizens and the strangers among them.

The taxes Canadian governments have so eagerly cut may have been paid by us, but they are not our money. We entrust this money to our governments so that they can assure us safe airports, clean water, breathable air, fine schools, valued health-care workers and a host of mundane and necessary controls over groups that would rather operate unfettered and unchecked.

In the welter of prose written since Sept. 11, I found this profound Irish proverb: "It is in the shelter of each other that the people live." This is what it means not to live only for one's own aggrandizement – the shelter of each other. Otherwise we will wake up one morning, living in Sodom.

The importance of volunteers

In the days after Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, and in the aftermath of the terrorist attack on the World Trade Center in New York, it really does appear as if God has come to judge the world. There have been so many words written and spoken about this horrible event and its political, philosophical, economic and religious consequences that one more column on the topic seems unnecessary. And yet there is one aspect that, as time goes by, seems to recede into the background but which deserves some notice – that is, the enormous number of volunteers who literally rushed to assist the victims and the rescuers, in some instances putting their own lives at risk.

Bruce Elman in Windsor

When I saw this outpouring of volunteerism, I remembered the Aug. 18 headline in The Globe and Mail: "Alert raised as 1 million fewer now volunteer." The report, by Andre Picard, details the results of the National Survey of Giving, Volunteering, and Participating. The survey indicates the pool of volunteers nationwide has dropped from 7.5 million in 1997 to 6.5 million in 2000 and that the total number of volunteer hours has fallen from 1.109 billion to 1.053 billion in the same time period.

The story points out that this is a "staggering job loss for Canada's 80,000 charities." (This translates into a loss of some 29,000 jobs.) Apparently the situation would be much worse if it were not for the fact that those who continue to volunteer are giving more time to such endeavours – an average of 162 hours a year to these activities. Seven per cent of the volunteers are providing 73 per cent of the volunteer hours.

Demographically, the members of the volunteer group are older, married, well educated, have above-average incomes, are religiously involved and have children between the ages of six and 17. This group is disappearing, however, as the postwar baby boomers, myself included, move towards old age.

Do these results also apply to the Jewish community? I have no idea, but I was struck by something my sister-in-law Sandi said to me a few weeks ago as my wife's family gathered in Detroit. She was reading the obituary section of the Detroit Jewish News and was astounded by the number of companies advertising services associated with bereavement – funerals, internment and shiva. "Planning for shiva is difficult, let us take care of all your needs," read one advertisement. I was struck by the fact that this is an aspect of Jewish life which used to be – and probably in smaller cities still is – handled by volunteers. (I know of no more dedicated a group of volunteers in Edmonton than the men and women of the chevrah kadishah.)

What are the reasons for the decline in volunteerism? No one is exactly sure. Perhaps, as suggested in the article, it is that workers are under increasing time pressure, or that volunteers are burning out because of the demands placed on them due to government cutbacks. It could also be due to advances in modern communication technology – we are never really away from work.

Perhaps it could be because women, who I suspect once provided the majority of volunteer time, are entering the regular work force in ever-increasing numbers. Or it could be that we, as a whole, are simply becoming ever more selfish – our parents are passing on and they are being replaced, in the volunteer-eligible sector, by the so-called "Me Generation" and "Generation X." Whatever these terms exactly mean, they are apparently not translating into more volunteers for society.

When a tragedy occurs such as the terrorist attack on the World Trade Center, it tends to bring out the best in people. We have to remember that there are small, sometimes personal, tragedies occurring somewhere in the world every single day and that we can help others, through our volunteerism in those tragedies as well. Indeed, we can help others even if there is no tragedy at all.

In the new year, in addition to thinking about those things we will not do during the coming 12 months, we should resolve to do acts of chesed – kindness – as well.

CORRECTION

In Robert Sarner's column of Oct. 4, the number of Israelis killed in the intifadah was printed incorrectly. The sentence should have read: "Most devastated of course are the families and friends of the 180 Israeli men, women and children killed..." The CJN regrets the error.

Egypt, Israel and the crisis in Afghanistan

As the United States cobbles together an international coalition to destroy Osama bin Laden's Taliban-backed Al-Qaeda terrorist network, the spotlight falls uncomfortably on Egypt.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Egypt, governed by President Hosni Mubarak, is one of Washington's key Arab allies in the Middle East. A recipient of massive U.S. aid, Egypt joined the American-led coalition that ousted Iraq from Kuwait in 1991.

A decade on, with the United States preparing to attack bin Laden's lairs in Afghanistan and confront global terrorism, Mubarak appears less willing to be so openly identified with American policy in the region. Starkly put, Mubarak fears that the backlash radiating from this unfolding crisis may yet stir the latent forces of Islamic fundamentalism in Egypt and thus destabilize his regime. Last week, U.S. Secretary of Defence Donald Rumsfeld went to Cairo to stiffen Mubarak's resolve.

Objectively, Mubarak has reason to be concerned. Twenty years ago this week, Anwar Sadat, his predecessor, was assassinated by a band of Islamic extremists as he reviewed a military parade in Cairo commemorating the eighth anniversary of the October War, known otherwise as the Yom Kippur War.

The conspiracy to kill Sadat was masterminded by Khaled Ahmed Shawki al-Istambuli, a 24-year-old Egyptian army artillery officer and member of Al-Jihad (Egyptian Islamic Jihad), an organization dedicated to foisting an Islamic regime on Egypt.

Istambuli, who was summarily executed after a show trial, targeted Sadat because of his pivotal role in forging a historic rapprochement with Israel which culminated in a 1979 peace treaty, and because he despised American influence in Egypt and throughout the Middle East.

Shocked by the sophistication of Al-Jihad's plot against Sadat, Mubarak did what Sadat had attempted to do after visiting Israel in November 1977. He appeased and intimidated the forces of Islamism, hoping that the combination of socially conservative policies, overt support for the Palestinians, anti-Israel diatribes in the Egyptian media and occasional police crackdowns would keep Islamic radicals in check.

For a while, the strategy – which backfired disastrously on Sadat – worked, despite the grinding poverty and endemic corruption on whose foundation Islamic fundamentalism thrives.

But in the wake of the Gulf War, Mubarak discovered that he had engaged in wishful thinking. Islamists, having grown bolder by the inroads they had achieved in Egyptian society, were enraged by the presence of American troops in Saudi Arabia – the cradle of Islam – and the biting effects of United Nations economic sanctions on Iraq's civilian population. Resenting the West's harsh treatment of Iraq and its supposed coddling of Israel, they blamed Mubarak for tolerating and acquiescing to such a situation.

Al-Jihad and al-Gama al-Islamiya (the Islamic Group), both of which have links with bin Laden, embarked on a terrorist campaign in 1992 to topple Mubarak, who had been commander of the air force during the Yom Kippur War. They singled out Egyptian government officials and the tourist industry, one of the pillars of Egypt's economy.

In June 1995, after unsuccessful attempts to murder the interior minister, Hassan al-Alfi, and the prime minister, Atef Sedky, the Islamic Group almost succeeded in killing Mubarak in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. In November of that year, Al-Jihad operatives bombed the Egyptian embassy in Islamabad, Pakistan, leaving a trail of death and destruction.

In 1996, Islamic gunmen mowed down 18 Greek tourists in Cairo, mistaking them for Israelis. And in November 1997, in their grisliest operation, they slayed 58 foreign tourists, many Swiss, in Luxor. From a public relations point of view, the Luxor massacre was a complete debacle for Al-Jihad and the Islamic Group. They were forced to negotiate a ceasefire, which has endured.

The spiritual leader of the Islamic Group, Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, was deported to the United States to face charges for his involvement in a conspiracy to bomb the United Nations and several other landmarks in New York City, including the luckless World Trade Center. He and his confederates, having been found guilty, are now serving life sentences.

The story does not end there. Two Egyptian dissidents, Mohamed Atta and Ayman al-Zawahiri, directly and indirectly, participated in last month's plan to destroy the World Trade Center. Atta was the pilot of the commercial airliner that crashed into the north tower. Al-Zawahiri is reported to be bin Laden's closest associate.

Mubarak, having been stung by the fury of Islamic fundamentalism, unequivocally condemned the Sept. 11 atrocities, which have claimed thousands of lives in Manhattan, Washington, D.C. and Pennsylvania.

"We support the United States in fighting terrorism," he said in Berlin during a state visit to Germany.

But being wary of the Islamic backlash that will surely buffet his government should Egypt be a prominent member of the coalition, Mubarak added an important caveat, the echoes of which have been heard around the Arab world.

In a nod to Islamic public opinion, he declared that the battle against terrorism is inextricably connected with the Arab-Israeli conflict, or, as he put it, "the Palestine problem."

Visiting President George W. Bush at the White House last week, King Abdullah II of Jordan made the same point. The foreign ministers of six Arab Gulf states issued a similar statement two weeks ago, noting that any anti-terror campaign should consider the "terrorism" Israel has inflicted on the Palestinians during the current intifadah.

Egypt, whose peace treaty with Israel has produced no more than a cold peace, sharpened its polemics toward Israel long before the Sept. 11 crisis flared.

At the Camp David summit in July 2000, Mubarak urged Yasser Arafat, the president of the Palestinian Authority, to adopt an unyielding position with respect to eastern Jerusalem and the Temple Mount. Last November, in a protest over Israel's handling of the Palestinian uprising, Mubarak recalled Mohammed Bassiouny, Egypt's seasoned ambassador in Israel.

Since then, much to Israel's irritation, Egypt has consistently called for international monitors to be sent to the West Bank and Gaza Strip. And at the recent anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, Egypt supported a resolution branding Israel as a racist state. Egypt also opposed a Norwegian compromise that would have enabled Israel and the United States to remain at the conference.

Egypt's animus toward Israel, which is often reflected in its state-controlled press, has increased since Ariel Sharon took office seven months ago. Mubarak, who has yet to meet Sharon, has described him as a man "who knows only murder, aggression and war." Taking his cue from Mubarak, Egypt's newly appointed foreign minister, Ahmed Maher, has excoriated Israel's policy of hunting down Palestinian militants, and he has termed Sharon's government a "gang of assassins." Still more seriously, Egypt has cancelled a deal to export natural gas to Israel.

It goes without saying that Egypt's attitude to Israel will grow even colder once hostilities in Afghanistan begin and Egypt is called upon to assist the United States in eradicating the forces of Islamic terrorism.

Jewish Life

In the beginning...

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

The story of Creation is very economical in its words except for one part. We are told very little about the creation of the stars and the moon, very little about the earth and the seas. However, when the vegetation is created (Genesis 1:11), the Torah is not only verbose, but in fact is a little repetitive in emphasizing that the grass had its own seeds and the trees had fruit which had seeds.

Then when the birds and fish are created (Genesis 1:22), they are blessed to be fruitful and multiply. In addition, when man and woman are created, they too are blessed and told to be fruitful and multiply.

It seems the notion that the grasses will propagate is important to the story of Creation, as is the notion that the fruits will propagate, the fish and the birds will be fruitful and that human beings too will reproduce.

What is the Torah teaching us by emphasizing the fruitfulness of these parts of Creation? There are many aspects of the various parts of Creation which the Torah leaves unspoken – the forces of gravity of the celestial bodies are not described, nor are the nourishing aspect of the vegetation or the benefit of the sun for growth through photosynthesis. The list of the things the Torah left unsaid could go on for a long time – why emphasize the seed bearing aspect of the vegetation and the ability to propagate of the animals?

Rav Soloveitchik taught that the Torah wants to point out a critical aspect of Creation that contains a critical lesson for humanity. God is telling us that although He created the world, we complete it. We are partners in the creation. He did not create a world that is stagnant – a world that is finished. He created a world that needs to continue the Creation. Each species will continue to create each new generation.

Just as the physical world creates each new generation and continues the work of Creation, so too in the spiritual realm, the world needs to continue the act of Creation. God created the world and gave it to us to continue as creators. Of course, there are limits to the areas in which we are creative – it is not within our ability to change the laws of nature, nor in the spiritual realm can we change the laws of the Torah. However, within both the physical world and the spiritual realm, we are empowered and instructed to discover the laws of the physical world, to uncover its secrets. And in Torah, we are empowered to be creative in understanding its laws and its secrets.

God made us His partners – it is our job to imitate His creativity in creating our world of holiness and blessing.

Israel's water crisis – part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Earlier this week, on Shemini Atzeret, Jews around the world recited the beautiful Tefillat Geshem, the prayer for rain: "...for blessing and not for curse. For life and not for death. For plenty and not for scarcity" [http://www.ou.org/chagim/shmini-simchat/geshem.htm].

Yet unfortunately, Israel and its neighbours have been suffering from a scarcity of rain for the past three years. The general shortage of water in the region has become one of the most contentious issues facing the peace process. Today, as the rainy season begins, a look at Israel and the water shortage.

After three years of drought, Lake Kinneret (the Sea of Galilee) is at its lowest level in recorded history. Sinkholes have appeared on the shores of the Dead Sea and earlier this year, there was talk of a ban on watering gardens in Israel. Why has the situation been allowed to deteriorate so seriously?

As reporter Herb Keinon says in an article in the Jerusalem Post, there have been warnings for years but no one seemed to be listening. He quotes Haim Gvirtzman, a Hebrew University hydrologist: "No one cares. Everyone cares about politics, about peace, about making money. Who cares about things like health, the environment or water?"

Hillel Shuval, also at Hebrew University, says that Israel hasn't had a long-term water plan since the 1956 decision to create the National Water Carrier [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2000/06/22/Features/Features.8585.html]. Future prime minister Levi Eshkol helped develop plans for a single network to link most of the regional water projects throughout the country [http://research.haifa.ac.il/~eshkol/#water]. The huge civil engineering project joined the Kinneret with Israel's other aquifers and is credited with pumping water and bringing life to the Negev and allowing portions of the desert to bloom, a dream of another prime minister, David Ben Gurion [http://www.boker.org.il/eng/mdrabt.htm]. But with low rainfall and high demand, the Kinneret's water level has been falling. If it continues to fall, there is a risk that the intake pumps will draw air, not water [http://israeliculture.about.com/library/extra/blwater.htm].

The Kinneret isn't the only Israeli lake with problems. The Dead Sea, the lowest point on earth, is also experiencing a serious decline in sea level. Water diversion projects and industry on both the Israeli and Jordanian sides have reduced the Dead Sea to record lows. As the Jerusalem Post reported, "The Dead Sea is dying of thirst." [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2001/04/29/Features/Features.25267.html] As the level drops – at the rate of one metre every year – resorts are finding themselves farther and farther from the water's edge.

Of course, Israel's water crisis extends well beyond its borders and could result in regional conflict, or worse. Ismail Serageldin, vice-president of the World Bank, said in 1995: "If the wars of this century were fought over oil, the wars of the next century will be fought over water, unless we change our approach to managing this precious and vital resource." [http://www.serageldin.net/frameе.htm]

Perhaps the best site to read up on Israel's water shortage is Ha'aretz newspaper's Water Crisis Web site [http://www2.haaretz.co.il/special/water-e/]. In the article, "The water dispute reawakens," Ze'ev Schiff suggests that the most sensitive item on the Jordanian-Israeli agenda is water. He explains how intimately tied the countries' water needs are, from dam creation in Jordan to desalination plants to Israeli providing the kingdom with millions of cubic feet of water annually.

For more background, see Ellis Shuman's "The geopolitics of Israel's water shortage" and other articles [http://israeliculture.about.com/library/extra/blwaterb.htm]. As well, the Jewish Virtual Library has a water reference area [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/History/watertoc.html].

To see how things are viewed on the other side of the Jordan River, take a look at Waternet [http://allserv.rug.ac.be/~sdconinc/waternet/], a site that reprints water-related articles from many sources, including the Jordan Times. And the Applied Research Institute-Jerusalem has published a paper about the water conflict from a Palestinian perspective [http://www.arij.org/pub/wconflct/].

Although the situation is very serious, there have been some suggested solutions – to be looked at next time.

Jewish Life

A path toward integrity

Living a Life That Matters* by Rabbi Harold S. Kushner, Random House, 2001

Books
Bernard Baskin

How can we add meaning to our lives? What makes a moral choice correct or proper? Are power and wealth true measures of achievement? Must integrity be compromised in order to achieve success? Why is it harmful to thirst for revenge? How essential is enduring friendship? Where is God to be found? How can the elderly avoid stagnation?

These are some of the salient questions that Rabbi Harold Kushner poses in this brief but helpful book. The author is well known for such previous works as When Bad Things Happen to Good People, Who Needs God and How Good Do We Have to Be? He is a skilful and astute mentor for those navigating the rough patches of life: loss, guilt, and crises of faith.

In an apt story about the conflicting urges within each of us, Rabbi Kushner describes a native American Indian leader with an inner struggle. "He said, 'There are two dogs inside me. One of the dogs is mean and evil. The other dog is good. The mean dog fights the good dog all the time.' When someone asked him which dog usually wins, after a moment's reflection he answered, 'the one I feed the most.'"

For the author, our souls are split, part of us reaching for goodness, part of us chasing fame and fortune and doing questionable things along the way. Our self-image is like an out-of-focus photograph, two slightly blurred images instead of one clear one. "Much of our lives, much of our energy will be devoted to closing that gap between the longings of our soul and the scoldings of our conscience."

Rabbi Kushner points out the importance of religious ritual. He relates that often before a funeral a family member will say, "Rabbi, we're not religious. Do we have to observe the shivah memorial week and have all those people crowding our living room at a time like this?" He replies that they must do so, not for God's sake but for their own, because they're going to feel alone and abandoned. And, it's important to know that they are not alone. Also, it is important to perform the ritual for the sake of friends, because they feel your pain and want to take some of it unto themselves – to grieve with you.

Ultimately, relationships are what matter. "When Martin Buber, the great Jewish philosopher and theologian, was asked 'Where is God?' he was wise enough not to give the cliché answers: God is everywhere; God is found in churches and synagogues. Buber would answer that God is found in relationships. God is not found in people; God is found between people. When you and I are truly attuned to each other, God comes down and fills the space between us so that we are connected not separated."

Living a Life That Matters is replete with telling illustrations and wisdom that flows from 40 years of the author's experience as a pulpit rabbi. In a time of moral confusion and much uncertainty, Rabbi Kushner offers readers a path toward integrity in the continual struggle between conscience and success.

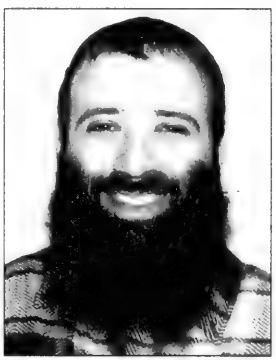
Goal is to 'create a love for the synagogue'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter



Rabbi Benzion Freundlich

TORONTO —Rabbi Benzion Freundlich has been appointed chazzan of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham.

He will lead services two or three times a month, as well as on yamim tovim. Also, he will assist at life cycle events, such as weddings and funerals.

His goal, he told The CJN, is to "create a love for the synagogue, not just on Shabbat, but during the week." He hopes to organize events for the shul community, such as barbecues and picnics.

The London, England-born Rabbi Freundlich studied at Lubavitch yeshivot in Manchester, England, Montreal, and St. Paul, Minn, where he received smichah. He has been a shaliach – a Lubavitch emissary – in such places as Kishinev, Moscow, Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan and Hong Kong.

He has served as cantor in synagogues in South Africa and London, England.

For some time, he said, he has been looking for a place to set down roots, especially since his marriage. Last year, he sang at Chabad of Markham, and was very impressed. "It is like being beside a fire on a cold winter night."

Rabbi Avraham Plotkin, Chabad of Markham's spiritual leader, is wonderful to work with, Rabbi Freundlich said. "He (Plotkin) loves his fellow Jew, and is there for people. It is a pleasure working with him and with his wife, Goldie."

The congregation, he said, has been very accepting and welcoming. In fact, he said, "people came to my house and did repairs and even fixed the air conditioning, without being asked. It gave me confidence that I made the right choice."

His davening will focus on community singing, "not just me performing. I studied at the Metropolitan Opera, so I know the difference (between performing and leading services). I choose catchy tunes, and encourage the congregation to sing along."

The job of a cantor, he mused, is not to "make a service. It is to make people feel linked to each other, to the prayers, and to God."

Many of the shul members are South Africans, who want traditional pieces, the rabbi added.

He is looking forward to working with the Chabad Men's Choir, led by Gary Rewald. The choir, which is affiliated with the Toronto Jewish Male Choir, is one of Chabad of Markham major attractions.

Freundlich's wife, Naamah, will be teaching at Torah Tots Preschool. The couple has a 16-month old son, Yehudah Leib.

Rabbi Plotkin said that "the appointment of Cantor Freundlich will further our objective of making our services attractive and soul-stirring, as we continue to endeavour to make every Jew feel comfortable and grow spiritually at our congregation."

Free Tay-Sachs, Canavan clinic planned by NCJW

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section's first community-wide genetic screening for carriers of Tay-Sachs and Canavan disease will be held Oct. 14.

The free clinic, for men and women 18 and older, will be held from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. at Council House, 4700 Bathurst St. It's sponsored by National Council of Jewish Women of Canada (NCJW), Toronto section, and the Hospital for Sick Children, division of clinical and metabolic genetics.

"We felt that the situation needed to be addressed once again. It is imperative to continue because there are people of child-bearing age who are not being tested. If one person is missed, that could result in a child who is a carrier," said Lorraine Berk, chair of NCJW's Jewish genetic awareness and testing program (JGAT).

Tay-Sachs Disease is a genetic disorder that causes progressive destruction of the central nervous system, and Canavan disease is a genetically inherited progressive brain disorder. To date there is no cure for either condition.

To be at risk of having an affected child, both parents must be carriers of the gene. When both parents are carriers, they have a one-in-four chance with each pregnancy of having an affected child.

In addition, a carrier of one copy of the inactive gene has a 50 percent chance of passing it to his or her children, making the children carriers as well.

A person's chance of being a carrier of either disease is significantly higher if he or she is of Ashkenazi descent.

Dr. Annette Feigenbaum, who is doing research on Canavan disease at The Hospital for Sick Children, said that although figures indicate that between one in 40 and one in 60 Jews in both New York and Israel are Canavan carriers, the ratio for Toronto's Jewish population is unknown.

But she said that if the figures for New York and Israel figures were to hold true for Toronto, "we do not know why we've only diagnosed one child with Canavan in the last 15 years [in Toronto's Jewish community].

"Either the carrier rate in Toronto is less, carriers are not marrying each other, or doctors are missing the diagnosis, which is very unlikely," she said.

"The bottom line is that it looks like we have a specific carrier rate, but we need more numbers. This clinic can help prove those numbers, and of course, it is providing a necessary service."

Terry Winston, executive director NCJW Toronto, said the organization has contacted every rabbi in the GTA asking them to tell their congregations about the free clinic.

"This is the pilot project of our JGAT program. We are planning to run two clinics a year, and we hope to sponsor lectures and panel discussions on the topic. We want to re-educate the community on the issue," said Winston.

ATTENTION ASHKENAZI JEWS (18 years & older)

Tay Sachs disease (TSD) and Canavan disease (CD)

are fatal progressive genetic inherited disorders affecting the nervous system of infants. There is at present no cure. 1/27 to 1/50 Ashkenazi Jews will be carriers of the abnormal gene for one of these conditions. This can be detected with a blood test to allow for accurate genetic counseling. Those previously tested for TSD are welcome to come for the CD test.

The letter, however, makes no reference to the handbook's pro-Palestinian content.

Lowy said the university disclaims responsibility for the publication and "dissociates itself from the content, and will take appropriate action where necessary... The CSU alone bears full legal and moral responsibility for the contents of the handbook."

Concordia's engineering and commerce students were also circulating a petition calling for the removal of the CSU executive and for new elections.

Steven Slimovitch, B'nai Brith's legal counsel, said the handbook has to be taken especially seriously in light of the recent attacks in New York.

"The glorification of violence is the important point," he said. "This is not a call for protest, but to glorify acts of violence. It's a call to physical violence.

"The police should follow up on the entire document.'"

Wilner said B'nai Brith was not trying to establish any sort of "connection" between the events in New York and at Concordia.

But Dimant said he fears the publication "could have the making of a blueprint."

He pointed out that the book's title, Uprising, could make it an explicit call for an "uprising, an intifadah in Canada.

"Let's not be naive and ignore the signs," he said.

Joseph Gabay, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, (CJC-Q) said the CSU handbook is "anti-everything that represents our civilization.

"It is the type of book that nurtures people with hate, a type of hate food," he said.

It reflects the kind of mentality in which "you start by burning the flag, and then anything else you can burn."

Instead, Concordia students might have been well-advised to burn their handbooks, Gabay suggested.

He said efforts should be made to replace the CSU leadership. But if Concordia's bylaws don't allow for new elections, then students should consider creating another, alternative student association.

Gabay feels the handbook is not very different from the hate-filled propaganda literature distributed within Palestinian society.

The Concordia Graduate Student's Association was also critical of the handbook. "We... would like to call attention to the fact that CSU does not speak for the entire university... We do not hold the same political agenda as the CSU, nor the same mandate," the association said in a recent press release.

Jerusalem hospital to honour Toronto doctor

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto psychologist Mary Blum Devor is being honoured by Jerusalem's Herzog Hospital-Ezrath Nashim with the establishment of the Mary Blum Devor Outreach Project for Children & Youth in Distress.

Mary Blum Devor

The project will kick off at a gala concert and silent auction sponsored by Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital-Ezrath Nashim on Oct. 16 at the George Weston Recital Hall, Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts. Reception is at 7 p.m., and the concert is at 8. A dessert reception will follow.

The concert will feature the Gryphon Trio chamber ensemble, vibroharpist Peter Appleyard and violinist Catherine Manoukian.

Before making aliyah in 1980, Blum Devor was chief psychologist at the Children's Aid Society Clinic in Hamilton, and went on to become its clinical director.

In Israel, she became senior consultant and head of family therapy at the children's clinic of Herzog Hospital. Although she returned to Canada in 1990, she still spends three months a year in Jerusalem, where she continues to see patients.

Riva Rotenberg, past president of Herzog Hospital-Ezrath Nashim and now a member of the board of the Canadian Friends, and a close personal friend, described Blum Devor as a person who is always available for her friends, her family, and her patients.

"When people know she is coming to Israel, they call to try to make appointments with her even before she gets there," Rotenberg said.

Blum Devor uses an empathetic approach in her therapy, Rotenberg said.

"When you are in trouble, you are not looking for sympathy, pity, or, especially, advice. Once you have shown empathy, you can sneak in some advice."

Rotenberg said that Blum Devor introduced the technique of time-limited therapy to the hospital, believing that if you can solve a particular problem, you can then deal effectively with other, more major issues.

(Time limited therapy includes a contract between the client and the therapist, to deal only with a specific problem and only for a particular time. For instance, the contract may be for 22 session to deal with temper tantrums.)

Blum Devor is very modest, Rotenberg said, and would only allow Canadian Friends to honour her because the money raised will go to the children's outreach program.

"The clinic badly needs renovations. It is in very small quarters, and there is a long waiting list for treatment."

Herzog Hospital-Ezrath Nashim was founded as a psychiatric facility in 1895. It is now the third largest hospital in Jerusalem, concentrating on geriatric and psychiatric medicine.

Located in one of the northernmost areas of Jerusalem, the facility serves the needs of the poor. It has become a leading treatment centre for children and young adults with ADD and ADHD, and provides a specialty clinic for children with Tourettes Syndrome, obsessive compulsive disorder and other brain syndromes.

For more information on the event, call Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital-Ezrath Nashim at 416-256-4222.

Dental fraternity int'l head lauds Toronto chapter

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Toronto Chapter of Alpha Omega Dental Fraternity "is the largest and best in the world," says the international president.

Dr. Michael Kohleriter, of Dallas, Tex., was in Toronto recently to address Alpha Omega's annual Fraternity Night Dinner held at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Dr. Avi Wurman, Toronto president, was presented with an efficiency award certificate for the Toronto Chapter, given annually to the most active and successful chapter internationally.

An Alpha Omega (AO) award of merit was presented to Dr. Jeremy Kellerstein, a recent dentistry graduate who demonstrated excellence in his academic studies in all four years.

Wurman, the evening's master of ceremonies, said Kellerstein had served as president of PI Chapter, made up of dentistry students at the University of Toronto.

The largely Jewish AO has a worldwide membership of more than 12,000 dentists and dental students in 125 alumni and student chapters.

Its philanthropic foundation has given more than $12 million to dental schools, clinics, scholarships, research grants and humanitarian causes.

In an interview, Kohleriter reflected on the many changes in dentistry over the years.

He said when he attended the University of Detroit's dental school in the early 1960s, few Jews were admitted under quotas – about one or two a year – a phenomenon that prevailed throughout North America and only began to change in the late 1960s and into the 1970s.

By contrast, he noted, today Dr. David Mock is U of T's first Jewish dean of dentistry.

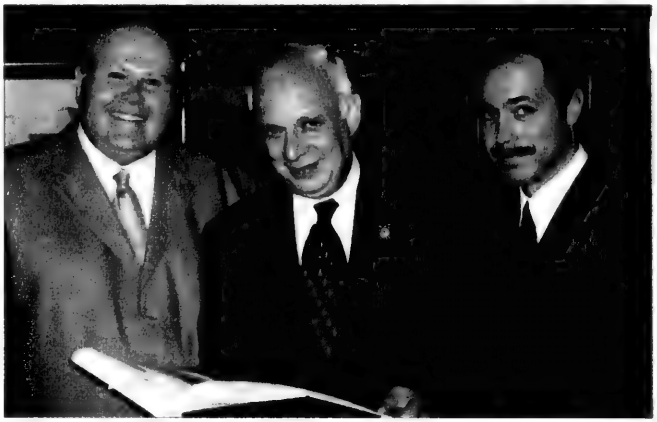
As well, about 50 per cent of dental students today are women. As a result, Kohleriter said, "our sensitivities and programs have changed to reflect our changing society."

He noted that Toronto will have its first female president, Dr. Sharon Perlmutter, in 2003 and Suzanne Reznick is president of the PI Chapter.

But Kohleriter said Jewish enrollment in dental schools has dropped radically of late "as some students attempt to pursue a more lucrative profession."

Kohleriter highlighted some philanthropic projects undertaken by AO chapters, such as in Toronto, where volunteers provide free dental service to clients of Jewish Family & Child Services.

In Israel, AO founded and supports both the Hebrew University-Hadassah School of Dental Medicine in Jerusalem and the Maurice and Gabriella Goldschlager School of Dental Medicine at Tel Aviv University.



Dr. Michael Kohleriter (centre), international president of Alpha Omega looks through the Toronto chapter's Efficiency Report with (left) immediate past international president Dr. Barry Chapnick and Toronto president Dr. Avi Wurman.

Elsewhere, AO members volunteer at nursing care facilities and advise staff on care of geriatric residents.

"We are a family," said Kohleriter. "We must band and work together to make our organization stronger so that we can make our world a better place and together bring forth the vision of tikkun olam, a healing of the world."

Wurman said AO is no longer a fraternity for just individual dentists, it is an organization for dentists and their families.

"Much of our programming in the past few years has focused on family participation because times have changed and in order to keep many of our younger fraters involved we will involve their families as well."

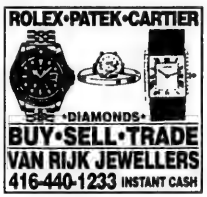
Former Torontonian helps Israeli girls from underprivileged homes attend camp



By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Girls from underprivileged homes in Israel have been given the opportunity to attend camp in Canada and the United States, thanks to the efforts of former Torontonian Tamar Rubinstein Koschitzky.

Three years ago, Rubinstein Koschitzky began tutoring English in a dormitory school in Raanana for youngsters from underprivileged homes. Some 80 percent were Ethiopian, she told The CJN in an interview during a recent holiday in Toronto. She was helping prepare them for the bogrut, the final matriculation exams.

"They just don't have the same exposure to English that other kids do – their parents may be illiterate, or they don't travel [where they would hear English spoken, or see English signs].

Experiment a smashing success

The mother of three young children decided to do something about it. Last year, she managed to send two 17-year-olds to Camp Sternberg in the Catskills.

"It was very last minute, and was problematic if we could pull it off. Kurt Rothschild [president of World Mizrachi and a family friend] knew someone, and helped us out."

Many camps hesitated to take the girls, because although they had studied English at school and could understand the language, their spoken English was very poor. The camps felt that they didn't have the facilities or the staff to deal with any potential problems, Rubinstein Koschitzky said.

But the experiment was a smashing success, she said. One of the girls, in fact, got along so well that she was asked to stay for a second session as a mother's helper.

Rubinstein Koschitzky decided to try again this year, but in a more formal way. "The girls had to fill in an application form and write an essay."

Airline tickets were donated, and the camps gave scholarships. Six girls were able to have a summer-camp experience this year – two at Camp Sternberg, one at Camp Moshava near Peterborough, and two at Camp Guila, an NCSY camp near Ottawa.

While some worked as junior counsellors, Rubinstein Koschitzky felt that "it was better that they go as campers, so that someone would be worrying about them, instead of them worrying about others."

The girls and their families were very excited about going, she said. Everyone pitched in to get them suitcases and supplies, with Rubinstein Koschitzky picking up the slack.

Although it was hard at first for the girls, and they were very homesick, they adjusted and had a great time, she said.

Everyone here tried very hard to make them feel at home, she said. In fact, her mother, Renee Rubinstein, hosted them on a layover here and helped out when when one girl lost her luggage.

Over the year, the girls kept in touch with some of the friends they had made, exchanging letters and pictures. Some girls from North America who are going to seminary or yeshiva in Israel plan to visit them.

Rubinstein Koschitzky hopes to get a grant next year from the Jewish Agency so she can expand the program to 12 girls.

Notice
To Victims of Anti-Semitic Persecution In France
Who may have had Bank Accounts in France during the World War II Period and their Heirs

The French Government has established a Commission for the Compensation of Victims of Spoliation Resulting from Anti-Semitic Legislation in Force During the Occupation (known by its French acronym C.I.V.S. and hereafter referred to as "the Commission"). Its mandate is to investigate and compensate claims by victims (or their heirs or successors) of anti-Semitic persecution in France during World War II. The Commission examines claims relating to any property frozen, blocked, looted, or Aryanized in France during World War II.

Victims whose assets were confiscated by the French or German Occupying goverments will be compensated by the compensation committee set up within the Prime Minister's Office after their claims have been reviewed by the CIVS.

On January 18, 2001, the governments of the United States and France signed an Executive Agreement (the "Agreement") which sets forth specific procedures for the handling of claims against banks by the Commission, including claims relating to any kind of bank account, such as checking accounts, savings accounts and safe deposit boxes. The Agreement also provides for additional compensation for victims of anti-Semitic persecution who may have had bank accounts looted.

This notice describes the provisions of the Agreement, as well as the claims process, and provides important information about two other compensation mechanisms, described at the end of this notice. You need not be French, need not be assisted by a lawyer, need not pay any fees, and need not even have any documentary evidence in order to file a claim.

The Agreement anticipates the dismissal of three proposed class action cases in U.S. courts: two cases filed in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York (Bodner v. Banque Paribas, Case 97 CIV 7433 (SJ) (MDG), and Benisti v. Banque Paribas, Case No. 98 CIV 7851 (SJ) (MDG), and one case filed in California State Court (Mayer v. Banque Paribas, Civil Action No. 302226). In each case, the plaintiffs sued banks doing business in France during World War II, for actions linked to the freezing, blocking and/or looting of account holders deemed to be Jewish under German or Vichy laws. The Federal court cases against all defendants other than two non-French banks, Barclays Bank and J.P. Morgan & Co., with which separate settlements were reached, were voluntarily dismissed on March 27, 2001. The California case was also voluntarily dismissed on June 15, 2001.

The Governments of the United States and France have endorsed in the Agreement the claims process of the Commission, and have declared their interests that this claims process be the exclusive remedy for resolution of all claims against banks which operated in France during World War II, other than Barclays Bank and J.P. Morgan & Co., (hereafter, the "Banks"), related to their activities in France during World War II. In any future case filed in the United States against the Banks, the Government of the United States will file a "Statement of Interest" with the court, explaining that dismissal of the case would be in its foreign policy interest.

Who is Eligible to Apply

You are eligible to apply for compensation if you or your family (including heirs or successors) were Jewish (or considered Jewish under German or Vichy laws) and if you believe that you or your family may have had any type of personal or business account at a bank in France during the period from September 1939 to May 1945. EVEN IF YOU ARE NOT SURE WHETHER YOU OR YOUR FAMILY HAD AN ACCOUNT, YOU MAY REQUEST A CLAIMS FORM AND FILE AN APPLICATION.

The Claims Process

The Commission will investigate all the claims which are filed. In that process, the Commission will have access to historical information from French public archives and banks, including lists of over 56,000 war-time account holders whose accounts were blocked under anti-Semitic German or Vichy laws. The Commission will also consider any evidence provided by a claimant. If after investigating a claim, the Commission recommends compensation in a specific amount, that sum will be paid promptly by the administrator of the escrow fund and the Caisse des Dépôts et Consignations from a renewable US$50,000,000 escrow fund, established by the Banks.

If the historical information available to the Commission confirms a claimant's account(s) and account balance(s) and there is no evidence of restitution on such account(s), the Commission is endeavoring to make awards as rapidly as possible following filing of the claim. Deductions will be made only for prior, proven restitution, relating to a specific account. There will be no deduction in the case of compensation or restitution of non-bank assets.

Under the Agreement, the Banks also have established a US$22,500,000 fund (the "Fund"), which will be used to make payments to claimants who may have had a bank account but whose names (or the names of their relatives) do not appear on any historical list and who otherwise do not have other evidence supporting their claim. If you believe you have such a claim, the Commission will accept an affidavit in support of your claim. The Commission will refer the names and applications of claimants having no other evidence of any account to the Fund. The Fund will make initial payments of US$1,500 to such claimant within 30 days after referral by the Commission. A second payment of up to US$1,500 may be made by the Fund after July 18, 2002, subject to the amount remaining, if any, in the Fund. TO BE ELIGIBLE FOR A PAYMENT FROM THE FUND, YOU MUST FILE A CLAIM WITH THE COMMISSION BY JULY 18, 2002.

The French Government has also established a Foundation for Memory of the Shoah. The Foundation's initial funding will be approximately US$375,000,000, including approximately US$100,000,000 transferred by the banks. The Foundation will distribute funds to organizations inside and outside France, including those that aid elderly or needy Holocaust survivors, and their families.

Which Banks are Covered by the Agreement

The Agreement applies to claims against all banks doing business in France during World War II. This includes non-French banks that operated in France through branches or subsidiaries, such as predecessor banks of The Chase Manhattan Bank. As to Barclays Bank and J.P. Morgan & Co., separate settlements have been concluded and are described below. These settlements cover all bank accounts at those banks and their predecessors during World War II.

How Do I Participate

The Commission will investigate claims in the order they are received, but will, however, give priority to claims by the aged, those in precarious financial circumstances, those in difficult social situations, and to those subject to referral to the Fund.

To obtain information or an application form, you may write to: The Commission for Compensation of Victims of Spoliation, 1 rue de la Manutention, 75116 Paris, France.

You may also call 00.800.2000.4000 (toll-free international number) or 1.866.254.3770 (toll-free from USA).

You may also contact :
- the Simon Wiesenthal Center in The United States at 1.800.900.9036, or in France at 33.(0)1.47.23.76.37;
- the Conseil Représentatif des Institutions Juives de France (CRIF) at 33.(0)1.42.17.11.11;
- the Fonds Social Juif Unifié (FSJU) at 33.(0)1.42.17.10.10;

Information is also available on the Internet site of the C.I.V.S. (www.civs.gouv.fr) in French and English - and soon in Hebrew. From the www.civs.gouv.fr Internet site, you may download and print the application (including the questionnaire and forms for powers of attorney and proxies), which you may duly submit to the Commission by mail or fax (33.(0)1.56.52.85.73).

You may also send your application (or a copy) to:
- The Simon Wiesenthal Center, 64 Avenue Marceau, 75008 Paris, France;
- the CRIF, 39 rue Broca, 75005 Paris, France;
- the FSJU, 39 rue Broca, 75005 Paris, France;
- or the European Jewish Congress, 76 Avenue des Champs Elysées, 75008 Paris, France,
- all of which organizations can assist you, at your request, in the application proceedings. To be eligible for payments from the Fund, claims must be received no later than July 18, 2002.

You may meet with representatives of the Commission in France or at contact centers at many French embassies and consulates around the world. You may also request that a representative to which you have given a power of attorney, such as the Simon Wiesenthal Center or the other organizations named above, meet with representatives of the Commission on your behalf.

Barclays Bank and J.P. Morgan & Co. Class Action Settlements

Separate settlements have been concluded with two other banks that operated in France during World War II: Barclays Bank and J.P. Morgan & Co. These settlements are different from the Agreement described above. First, for Barclays Bank and J.P. Morgan only, the United States District Court in the Bodner and Benisti cases has certified a world-wide settlement class, such that these settlements will bind all persons who do not exclude themselves by following the procedures in the mailed notice for these settlements. Second, these settlements make available to claimants separate funds established by these banks to satisfy claims.

If you believe that you or your family had any kind of bank account with Barclays Bank or J.P. Morgan & Co. or their predecessors, in France during World War II, you may obtain information on these separate settlements. You may also obtain information on the deadlines for filing objections or exclusion requests, and the claims filing deadline by telephoning 1.800.714.3304 (in the United States), 0.800.914.842 (in France) or 1.800.93.00.011 (in Israel), or by consulting the Internet sites: www.barclaysfrenchclaims.org and www.jpmorganfrenchclaims.org, or by writing to the Barclays/J.P. Morgan Settlement Administrator at P.O. Box 9260, Garden City, New York, 11530. If you do not know the name of the French bank with which you or your family may have had an account, please contact the Commission at the address listed above.

Hashomer Hatzair welcomes new shlichah

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two weeks into her position as shlichah at HaShomer Hatzair, Ora Merin had already made her mark.

With the help of a crew of student volunteers as well as artist/parent Yael Brotman, the north Toronto headquarters of the left-wing Zionist youth group was well on its way to being transformed when Merin was interviewed two days before Yom Kippur.

A fresh coat of paint covered the walls, and in each meeting room, a colourful depiction of Israel and another of the movement's Camp Shomria, were in various stages of completion, being painted right on the walls. Donated carpet was ready to be installed, and piles of clothes from the camp's lost and found were to be donated the next day, once campers were given a chance to claim them.

Merin "came in like a whirlwind" and organized everything, said Miriam Lamasz, the organization's administrative co-ordinator, who works with Merin and two other staffers in a small office upstairs from the meeting rooms. The youth movement shares office space with Canadian Friends of Givat Haviva, which supports an Israel-based, Jewish-Arab co-existence centre.

With the refurbishing out of the way, Merin, who replaced shaliach Noam Massad, can devote her full attention to the Toronto "ken's" (branch's) two main areas of focus: its summer and winter camps, and the local activities that began last week for students from Grade 3 to Grade 10. Older teens are involved in Hashomer Hatzair's leadership program. Forty of them travelled from Canada and the United States for a program in Israel this summer.

Ora Merin

The local programs of the international organization – which was established in eastern Europe in 1913 and which is affiliated with the 86 kibbutzim of Israel's Kibbutz Artzi Federation – are educational and fun, said Merin, a 39-year-old mother of four whose husband is doing a medical fellowship here. Before moving from Mevasseret Tzion, Merin managed the educational touring department of a major Israeli tour company, organizing Birthright programs for thousands of Diaspora teens.

In Toronto she is dealing with smaller groups – she expected more than 50 to turn up for the first program last Friday night.

Some of the issues to be dealt with this year, each in an age-appropriate group, are the Fight Against Terror, How I Relate to Israel and How Israel Relates to Me (including the right of Diaspora Jews to criticize Israeli politics), and the Relationship Between Boys and Girls. Jewish holidays are celebrated, and a memorial for the late Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin is also planned. Community work, Israeli music and dance are also part of the mix.

Most participants are not affiliated with a synagogue but are very Zionistic, said Merin, herself an alumna of the Israeli equivalent of the youth group Habonim Dror.

Israelis have a lot to give in terms of their spirit, said Merin, but they also have a lot to gain from rest of the Jewish world who "struggle to continue to be Jewish in a foreign country."

While aliyah is still a goal for Hashomer Hatzair, she said, it's "no less important to continue to be a Jew and a Zionist here."

2ND LOCATION NOW OPEN AT WOODBINE & STEELES

CONSTRUCTION IS NOW COMPLETED!
THE GARDEN BASKET IS NOW OPEN!

Dear Valued Customer,

As it was announced in your local newspaper in the early summer of this year, our Woodbine location (Comella Fine Foods) was about to begin extensive renovations and expansion and as a result the store had to be closed.

We are very happy to inform you that construction is now completed and we are ready and anxious to resume business. As previously announced, our newly expanded store will now operate under our own THE GARDEN BASKET name, winner of the prestigious "Consumers Choice Award" and "Readers Choice Award" since 1997.

You will be very pleased to discover the newly renovated and expanded "THE GARDEN BASKET" with its vibrant new colours, and a much larger variety of product lines in every department. We now carry natural and organic grocery products, as well as fresh organic produce.

Join us for our Grand Opening Celebrations where you'll have a chance to enter our $5000 free shopping spree giveaway! Not to mention all the savings on our terrific super specials. Don't miss out on all the festivities taking place throughout the month of October, including a colouring contest for kids and win a Sony Play Station 2. Details in store.

We would like to take this opportunity to thank you for your loyalty and your patience, and we apologize for any inconvenience the closing of the store may have caused you. We are very confident that you will be very pleased with THE GARDEN BASKET on Woodbine Avenue.

THE GARDEN BASKET is now open and we look forward to serving you.

Sincerely yours,

Jack Comella

Real estate developer celebrates 95th birthday

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Wearing his trademark fedora and a wisecracking grin, retired Toronto real estate developer Alex Beder celebrated his 95th birthday in early September by throwing a lavish dinner party for about 90 friends and colleagues at Captain John's Restaurant on the city's waterfront.

Former city councillor Tony O'Donoghue, retired publisher Avi Bennett and Irving Matlow, an official from the Association for the Soldiers of Israel, were among those who gave alternatingly heartwarming and comic testimonials to Beder, who was born in London in 1906 and came to Canada with his family in 1914.

Alex Beder

Another tribute came from Yael Dunkelman, widow of Ben Dunkelman, the acclaimed war hero and doyen of the Tip Top Tailors family, who had been a close friend of Beder's.

Letters of congratulations were read from the prime minister, the Governor General, the premier and Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, the mayor of Toronto, and former major league baseball player Lou Limmer.

Beder, whose family has belonged to the Holy Blossom Temple for nearly 90 years, received a long-distance call earlier in the day from its rabbi emeritus, Gunther Plaut, who had been unable to attend because he was in Israel.

Taking the podium, Beder recalled that he and his family had the first row of the balcony at Holy Blossom for roughly 50 years. He is a sponsor of the synagogue's Out of the Cold program for the homeless.

He noted that Rabbi Plaut "always seemed to be looking upstairs at me when giving his sermons. I now understand that he was checking to see whether I was still awake."

Beder dropped out of school at an early age and got his start in the family business, Beder Furs. At 17 he scored his first success by convincing Simpson's to buy fur bandings, which soon became enormously popular on ladies' dresses and coats all across Canada.

But it was as a real estate developer that he made his greatest mark, constructing many suburban homes and highrises in postwar Toronto. A born scrapper, he fought city hall and won on many occasions, affecting some important changes to the city's zoning codes.

During his speech, Beder related some of his less successful business ventures, such as the time he let a friend convince him to bring Chubby Checker, inventor of the dance craze the Twist, to Toronto for two shows at Maple Leaf Gardens.

A major winter storm wiped out the city on the day of the concert, he recalled, and "Chubby twisted in front of 14,000 empty seats."

In the early 1920s, Beder saw a sign on Bloor Street for Oliphant's, a body-building gym. He joined and remained a regular member for more than 40 years. He spoke of his early ambition to learn how to box, until a succession of cut lips and black eyes made him realize "I would rather be a lover than a fighter."

In 1984, his municipal connections earned him an invitation to lunch with the Queen and Prince Philip, who were then visiting Toronto. "Imagine a high-school drop-out, hobnobbing with royalty!" he exclaimed, describing it as a high point of his career.

His greatest stroke of good luck, he said, was in meeting and marrying his late wife, Terry, a former president of the women's division of the Variety Club. "She gave me the happiest 50 years of my life," he said.

He also recalled walking in many annual walk-a-thons for Israel since the early 1970s and meeting many injured soldiers through his involvement in the Association for the Soldiers of Israel, an organization he has long supported.

Beder expressed his thanks "to this great country of Canada, which has been so good to me. I hope I have also made a small contribution to Canada."

Winnipeg's 'Mr. Baseball' to be honoured

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The city's "Mr. Baseball" and one of its best-known citizens is being honoured by the Winnipeg chapter of the Canadian Friends of Ben-Gurion University.

Sam Katz, community philanthropist and president and CEO of Showtime Productions and president of the Walker Theatre Performing Arts Group, will be the honoree at a dinner on Sunday, Nov. 5.

Katz says that he was flattered to be asked but what really thrilled the happy father of a new baby daughter, he said, is that proceeds from the evening are going toward the creation of an endowment fund in pediatrics at the Israeli university.

Katz is the founder of the Winnipeg Goldeyes Field of Dreams Foundation, which has donated over $250,000 to local charities over the last six years. He is a lifetime member of both the Big Brothers Association of Winnipeg and the Transcona Optimist Club and was awarded the YMHA Builder of the 20th Century Award in June 2000.

"Sam has given a lot to the community without being asked," says Katz's friend, David Wolinsky, who was asked to approach Katz on behalf of the Ben-Gurion organization.

"He is a terrific role model."

In 1992, Katz brought professional basketball to the city and, in 1994, he realized a longtime dream to bring professional baseball here as well. Since he finished construction of Can West Global Park two years ago, tickets to Winnipeg Goldeyes games regularly sell out.

An investor in several restaurants and a comedy club in the city, Katz has been bringing rock concerts and travelling stage productions into Winnipeg for years. (He is the former CEO of Nite Out Entertainment.)

Yet what most people don't know about Katz is that he was born in Rechovot, Israel, coming to Winnipeg at a very early age.

"I still have a lot of family in Israel," he says, "a lot of aunts and uncles and first cousins. I was back for the first time when I was nine and have been back many times since. I was in Israel twice last year within a four month period."

The emphasis of the dinner, Wolinsky notes, will be on the cabaret-style entertainment.

"That's the way Sam wants it," Wolinsky says. "He wants to downplay his part in it."

How my prognostications fared

According to the Jewish calendar, this is the season for reflection and consideration. So, in an attempt to get with the spirit, we have taken pause to reflect on a few of our prognostications and observations over the last while.

The first observation that flows from this "spiritual cleansing" was prompted by an exasperated Letter to the Editor, that bemoaned the "shtadlan" attitude that we promote in this column. Well, we first had to check out the precise meaning of "shtadlan" before responding – and the best description we came up with was some sort of "court Jew" who, from time-to-time, pleaded the case of the Jews in a particular country.

We cannot recall ever having counselled that the Jewish community approach the political sector with "cap-in-hand". There is a substantial difference between knowing when to lay low and cowering before a government. When we suggested (in the immediate aftermath of the terrorist assault on the United States) that the Jewish community adopt a very discreet profile, it was on the basis that the Arab community – both here and abroad – had severely compromised their own credibility and that entering the fray would simply distract Canadians from the real issue. It was, we still believe, sound advice for then.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Since then, we acknowledge that the situation has evolved substantially. We would agree with Mickey Oberman who wrote to The CJN (Oct. 4), that now there is a need for an aggressive campaign to challenge the emerging perception that American support for an inflexible Israel is at the core of Arab desperation that results in terrorism. We will have to see if the B'nai Brith, Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada Israel Committee have the capacity to correct that emerging spin.

The second observation relates to Stockwell Day. We had pretty much dismissed him as a discredited force on the national scene with the expectation that he would soon exit the political stage. Ironically, this same World Trade Centre tragedy has given him new life.

The central concerns that surface are tailor-made for the Canadian Alliance – including the issues of immigration, security and relations with the United States. Couple that with the growing anxiety about the state of the economy (think taxes and control of government spending). It presents a perfect backdrop for Day to shine. And in fairness, he has done very well so far.

Will he be able to parlay his recent performance into a full(er) endorsement of his leadership? We remain doubtful, but at least it provides him with a reasonable shot if he is inclined to re-offer as leader of the CA.

We cannot guarantee the date a picture will appear. Please limit all greetings to 25 typewritten words. We reserve the right to edit all items and condense any that are longer than that.

Nazi hunter, CJC renew ties

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — American Nazi hunter and private investigator Steven Rambam says he's had his "ups and downs" with the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

CJC, Rambam said recently at a meeting of its Quebec regional council, was the only Canadian Jewish organization to "embrace what [I] had done" and to work with him when he came to Montreal about five years ago armed with scores of names of alleged Nazi war criminals who had openly admitted to him in taped confessions that they had murdered Jews.

But Congress and Rambam distanced themselves from each other after Rambam began to publicly criticize CJC and other Canadian Jewish organizations for not having enough "fire in their belly" when it came to pursuing the Nazi war crimes agenda.

"I did not imagine that there would be a single member who would not rise up in outrage," he said.

Now, CJC and Rambam are working together again, this time on the file of Joseph Kisielaitis, an alleged Nazi war criminal reputed to be living in LaSalle. A rally in front of Kisielaitis' home is being planned for the fall.

Rambam said he and the CJC will also work together on other cases.

They had initially parted ways, Rambam said, for several reasons.

"I expected an uproar and groundswell of support after I left," he said at the meeting.

That, he added, did not happen. And part of the problem, Rambam conceded, was due to his "American" style that, he said, is brasher and more aggressive than the CJC, which has worked behind the scenes to get Ottawa to move on the war crimes issue.

Rambam added that he also "made some very significant tactical errors."

The first, he said, was his expectation that the Canadian Jewish community would "carry the ball" the moment he left the country.

The second was to put too much focus on the large numbers of alleged Nazi war criminals in Canada, the type of numbers people really couldn't identify with.

"It doesn't work to talk about 'a thousand war criminals,'" Rambam said. So now, he noted, the focus will be to "work on one major Nazi in each major city," and not some "amorphous mob."

The third tactical error Rambam said he made, along with CJC, was to act as "nice guys." Rambam said a list of suspected war crimes was given to Canada's War Crimes Unit five years ago and "it [died] a quiet death."

Now, Rambam and CJC have become collaborators once again.

"We've reached a number of agreements with [CJC national director] Jack Silverstone and Irving Abella," he said.

When asked by a council member what the purpose of his crusade was, Rambam replied, "I'm a Jew.

"What astounds me is people who are constantly asking me why I'm doing this. The question should be, why aren't others doing it?"

"Yes, I've had my ups and downs with CJC," Rambam said, "but it's been a family dispute. I just want you [Congress] to do more.

"There should not be any division on this. There should be unity.

"It's a very simple issue. People who killed 850,000 Jews came to Canada, and were welcomed with open arms. [Except for Congress], all other Jewish organizations either sat or did nothing.

"There is still the opportunity to do the right thing and find justice, in five, or six, or 10 cases, to reclaim the honour of the Jewish community."

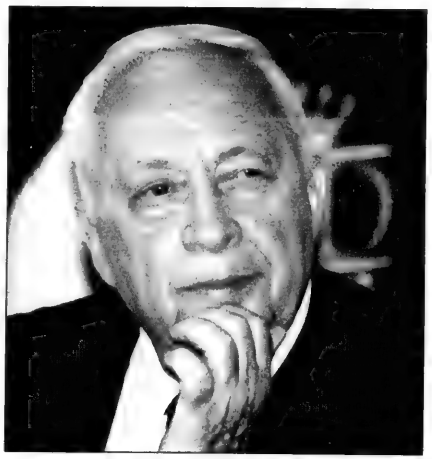
Powell warns Arafat: U.S. may change policy



Shimon Peres

Colin Powell

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — American officials reported last week that Secretary of State Colin Powell warned Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat in a phone conversation that if he does not take action to fulfil his obligations, Washington will not continue its current policy in regard to the Palestinians, Israel Radio reported.

The call came after Powell discussed with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres recent incidents of Palestinian violence in the territories.

Last Friday morning, following a Palestinian cabinet meeting in Ramallah, the Palestinian Authority released a statement calling on all Palestinian groups to stop attacks on Israel.

"The ceasefire is a Palestinian interest and all forces and officials are to strictly honour it," the announcement said. It also said that steps were being taken to ensure that the ceasefire is honoured in a manner that will prevent Israel from claiming that the Palestinian actions are "terror."

On Thursday, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon publicly criticized the United States and its policy in the Middle East for the first time, comparing Israel's situation today to that of Czechoslovakia on the eve of World War II.

At a press conference in Tel Aviv, Sharon called on the western democracies "not to repeat the horrible error of 1938. The enlightened democracies of Europe decided then to sacrifice Czechoslovakia in favour of a convenient temporary solution. Do not try to appease the Arabs on our backs. We will be unable to accept that. Israel will not be Czechoslovakia, Israel will fight terrorism."

Sharon stressed that "all of our efforts to reach a ceasefire were foiled by the Palestinians and the fire did not stop, not even for a single day. We can only rely on ourselves."

The prime minister's comments reflected the growing disappointment in the American administration's position regarding terrorism in the region, in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks on New York and Washington. Particularly disturbing is the fact that Syria and Iran are not being held accountable for their role in sponsoring terrorist activities against Israel.

Referring to Sharon's comments that the United States risked appeasing Arab nations at the expense of Israel, Ari Fleischer, President George W. Bush's spokesperson, told reporters, "Those comments made by the prime minister are unacceptable in the president's opinion."

He said the U.S. view had been communicated to Sharon through the U.S. Embassy in Israel and the National Security Council.

Minister Dan Meridor and National Security Advisor Gen. Uzi Landau were scheduled to travel to the United States to meet with senior White House and State Department officials. Former Israeli ambassador to the U.S. Zalman Shoval was also scheduled to visit Washington during the same period, as a personal envoy of the prime minister. The three will clarify the Israeli position, and attempt to convince the Americans to take action against Palestinian terror groups and Hezbollah.

Sharon spoke with Powell by telephone last Thursday and told him: "Arafat is not doing anything to prevent terror, attacks, shooting and incitement. There was not one day of quiet. We understand that we can only rely on ourselves. We will of course try to assist the coalition in any way, because we face the same enemy."

Sharon repeated his request to Powell to include Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah on the list of terror organizations "to be addressed immediately," because "that is the one thing that will put pressure on Arafat to take action."

U.S. says 'no evidence' Russian plane crash was result of terrorism

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The White House said last Friday that the United States had seen no evidence to indicate a Russian plane crash the day before was the result of an act of terrorism.

The plane was carrying 77 passengers and crew, of whom at least 51 people were Israeli citizens, when it exploded in mid-air during a flight from Israel to Siberia and crashed into the Black Sea.

"At this time we still haven't seen anything that would indicate it was terrorism," said White House spokesperson Ari Fleischer.

U.S. officials have said all indications were the Tupolev-154 passenger plane, flying from Tel Aviv to Novosibirsky in Siberia, was accidentally shot down on Thursday by a surface-to-air missile fired during a Ukrainian military exercise. Ukraine has denied responsibility.

The plane, Siberia Airlines charter flight 1812, took off at around 10:00 A.M. local time on Thursday from Tel Aviv. It was carrying at least 66 passengers and 11 crew members.

Russia asks U.S., Israel for help

Russia launched an investigation Friday into the cause of the tragedy, with President Vladimir Putin appointing Vladimir Rushailo, head of the presidential security council, to head the investigation.

Russia's chief prosecutor's office said Prosecutor General Vladimir Ustinov had invoked a criminal investigation under article 205, which is used to deal with terrorism. Putin said Thursday the crash might be a "terrorist act", but later called on the media not to "sensationalize" the accident.

On Friday morning, the Ministry of Immigration released the names of 33 Israelis who were aboard the plane, Israel Radio reported. Thirty-three other names were still being checked.

The Russian inquiry got underway as rescuers continued to search for the bodies of those aboard the aircraft. An Emergency Ministry spokesperson in Moscow said 11 ships were involved in search operations at the crash area 185 kilometres southwest of the Russian resort of Sochi. Russian press agencies reported that 16 bodies have been recovered from the crash area.

Saying that it lacks proper equipment, Russia has asked the United States and Israel for assistance to recover the plane's black recorder box, which lies somewhere in the Black Sea at depths of up to 1,000 metres.

In co-operation with Russian officials, an Israeli rescue team composed of navy and air force personnel was to have headed to the crash site last Saturday night after the Sabbath, primarily to help identify the bodies of victims.

The Russian investigation team has already begun examining parts of the plane that have been recovered, including the cockpit which was almost entirely intact. An initial examination found three holes in the cockpit, resembling those made by gunfire, but further tests were needed to confirm how they were caused.

American officials from the Pentagon said last Thursday that satellite pictures showed the plane had been hit by a missile. Earlier U.S. government claims that the plane could have been struck by a Ukrainian army missile during a training exercise were denied by the Ukrainian defence ministry. Col. Vyacheslav Sedov of the Russian defense ministry said the ministry had heard reports about a stray missile hitting the plane but would not make any immediate comment.

But Igor Laricev, a senior Ukrainian navy official stationed in the Black Sea, said that the plane was apparently shot down by a Ukrainian missile. "Missiles with a range of 400 kilometers were launched as part of an anti-aircraft exercise in the southern part of the Ukraine," he said.

Russian Deputy Transport Minister Karl Ruppel said that the crew of an Armenian An-24 airliner in the area had informed Russian air traffic controllers in Rostov-on-Don in southern Russia that they saw an explosion aboard a plane flying nearby.

Ruth Bar-On, head of Israel's Sela (the Center for Assistance to Immigrants in Crisis), said the organization was assisting families who lost relatives in the tragedy – many of them Russian immigrants – and who had arrived at Ben-Gurion airport.

"We are also going to visit the homes of those who have not come to the airport," she said. "From what I can see, many of those who have turned to us need help, whether it be help in funding a flight to the site of the crash or whether it be in gaining information."

The Week in Israel

Oct. 1

• A car bomb exploded in the Talpiot neighbourhood of southern Jerusalem. No one was hurt. Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility.

• Palestinians fired two mortar shells toward Jewish communities in the Gaza Strip and hurled grenades at two army posts there.

• Israeli Arabs marked the first anniversary of the riot in which 13 members of their community were killed in clashes with the police.

Oct. 2

• Sukkot.

• Two Palestinian terrorists attacked the community of Alei Sinai in the northern Gaza Strip, killing two Israelis and wounding 15 others. The attackers were killed. In response, the IDF destroyed Palestinian farmland and shelled seven police stations near Alei Sinai. Six Palestinians were killed.

Oct. 3

• An Israeli couple were wounded when Arab gunmen fired on them on the Ramot to French Hill highway.

• Two Israeli women were injured, one of them critically, by Palestinian gunfire in Hebron. The Palestinians opened fire as thousands of Israelis were attending a Sukkot holiday event next to the Cave of the Patriarchs, where a stage had been built.

Oct. 4

• Three Israelis were killed and 13 injured when a suspected Palestinian, wearing an IDF uniform, opened fire in the bus station in Afula. The gunman was killed by security officials.

Oct. 5

• An Israeli civilian, Hananya Ben Avraham, 48, of Modin was killed in a shooting attack as he was driving east of Tul Karm.

Some media orthodoxies are now shattered

According to Reports

The shattering impact of the horrific Sept. 11 attacks on the United States has reinforced extremism among some, but has also begun to shatter knee-jerk orthodoxies for a small number of commentators.

Prominent among the latter is Christopher Hitchens, an always riveting and often controversial writer for the Nation magazine. Long a staunch leftist critic of U.S. foreign policy and Israel, Hitchens has insisted on recognizing the utter evil of the Sept. 11 atrocities for what is. And that means keeping his critique of U.S. policy in a perspective that does not allow its employment as a rationalizing tool with which to beat the United States on this occasion.

This is not a time for the reaffirmation of rigid ideologies. It's a time for clarity free of such rigidities. To underscore this point, Hitchens has published his argument in both the leftist Nation (in the article, Against Rationalization), and the rightist Spectator (The Fascist Sympathies of the Soft Left). Both articles deserve careful attention.

Part of Hitchens' critique involves a rare, head-on collision with Noam Chomsky, a linguistics scholar of genius, better known as a radical political essayist whose lambasting of U.S. foreign policy is unbounded.

On the day of the suicide bombings in New York and Washington, Chomsky said that while the attacks were horrible, Bill Clinton's bombing of a pharmaceutical plant in Khartoum in 1998 was worse, since "probably... tens of thousands" were killed in that attack.

Chomsky's misuse of reason is appalling. He cited no source for his astonishing Khartoum victim count; and the moral equivalence he drew between the two events is absurd. The attacks on the U.S. were the result of long-planned, deliberate slaughter of as many civilians as possible, even to the point of using other civilians as part of the bombs; the U.S. operation in Khartoum was a military strike on what was believed, mistakenly, to be a munitions plant, carried out in retaliation for terrorist attacks on two U.S. embassies in East Africa that left hundreds of people dead and injured.

No wonder Hitchens characterized Chomsky's comparison as morally and intellectually bankrupt. (This is fundamentally the same point made several years ago by the highly respected liberal French intellectual, Pierre Vidal-Naquet, who in his book, Assassins of Memory, exploded Chomsky's "free speech" defence of Holocaust denier Robert Faurisson.)

Chomsky would not figure so prominently here were it not for the fact that among key elements of the Canadian media, he has attained something of a cult status, a phenomenon that either contributes to or feeds from his extreme anti-Americanism and anti-Zionism. In a number of discussions about the depth of anti-American sentiment among some commentators, Chomsky's influence has not been mentioned, though it should not be overlooked.

On the issue of Israel and the events of Sept. 11, Hitchens, following critical comments about Israeli policy, wrote: "Does anyone suppose that an Israeli withdrawal from Gaza would have forestalled the slaughter in Manhattan? It would take a moral cretin to suggest anything of the sort; the cadres of the new jihad make it very apparent that their quarrel is with Judaism and sectarianism on principle, not with (or just with) Zionism."

Jordan Pettle takes on Steve Martin's Picasso

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — Two Jewish brothers, Jordan and Adam Pettle, are blazing a meteoric trail through Toronto's art world these days.

Jordan, 30, has been cast as Pablo Picasso in Picasso at the Lapin Agile opening Oct. 22, at Canadian Stage's Bluma Appel Theatre, and he will be playing the central character, Ben, in his brother's play, Zadie's Shoes, being remounted at the Winter Garden in late March.

And, as if that's not enough, Jordan is also directing Adam's play, Therac 25, about Adam's cancer, now in remission, at Factory Theatre in May.

So in May, Jordan will be directing Therac 25 in the daytime and acting in Zadie's Shoes at night.

"We are very close and work well together," says Jordan, who is slightly older than Adam, 28.

They are the only children of Naomi Teitel and Alvin Pettle of Toronto. They have two stepsisters, since their father has remarried.

Picasso at the Lapin Agile is a fantasy in which a young Albert Einstein, 25, (played by Alon Nashman) meets Picasso, 23, at the famous Bohemian bar Lapin Agile in Paris when both are on the brink of the work that made them famous. In fact, some of Picasso's best known works are of the bar's performers and habitués.

The play, written by comic actor and writer Steve Martin, is being directed by Randall Arney, an American who also led productions of the play in Chicago and New York.

"It is a wonderful comedy and a good play for this time when we all need a good laugh and hope for the future, which is what this play is all about," Jordan says.

Jordan admits he was not very familiar with Picasso's work when he landed the role, but since then he has attended the recent Picasso érotique exhibition at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts and has seen some of the artist's work in Venice. "I like his art a lot; some of his work is amazing. He was so prolific, he just blows me away."

In Martin's fantasy, the encounter between Picasso and Einstein at the bar, inhabited by artists, circus performers and prostitutes, takes place shortly before Einstein published his theory of relativity and Picasso's Les Demoiselles d'Avignon revolutionized the art world.

Picasso at the Lapin Agile runs until Nov. 17. For more information, call (416) 368-3110, or visit www.canadianstage.com

Eye on Arts

THE SHOW GOES ON AT MUSEUM OF CIVILIZATION

The Lands Within Me, a controversial exhibition by 26 Canadian artists of Arab descent is set to open Oct. 19 at the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Hull, Que., despite allegations that it promotes hatred against Americans and Israelis.

According to the Toronto Star, the show contains a video that "denounces the U.S. and Israel, and calls for Arab resistance."

Late last month, the museum's management decided to shelve the exhibition temporarily so it could frame it in a "new context created by the tragic events of Sept. 11." But Prime Minister Jean Chretien publicly intervened and ordered that the show must go on as originally scheduled.

Keith Landy, national president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, has expressed concern that the Museum is being "used as a vehicle to promote the kind of hatred which is at the root of the attack against the United States" on Sept. 11.

But the Prime Minister is probably right that it's better to err on the side of artistic freedom. After all, the show has been several years in the making.

There will likely be a strong public outcry against any overwhelmingly hateful messages imbedded in the art. Critics might even start asking whether it is art or political propaganda, and whether our national institutions should be spending tax dollars to help propagate incendiary political messages.

I bet the Museum brass will think twice before they allow it to happen again.

Media Watch: The October issue of Toronto Life contains a couple of articles that I found too compelling to put down unfinished, plus another piece that seems eerily prescient of Sept. 11.

Writer Ellen Vanstone, late of the National Post, has produced an endearing, albeit unabashedly gossipy, expose of the inner workings of that incredible newspaper whose corporate offices are on Don Mills Rd., not far from The CJN.

Marci McDonald's profile of David Frum, "our man in the White House," is a timely and engaging look at the extraordinary career of the Toronto-born neoconservative thinker who derived maximum intellectual benefits by being the son of Toronto developer Murray Frum and the late journalistic legend, Barbara Frum.

In case you don't know, David Frum's current address is Washington DC, where he works as economic speechwriter for President George W. Bush.

The story I found too apropos of current events to read is The Office Tower, by Andrea Curtis. It's a profile of the 68-storey First Canadian Place. Conceived and written well before September, it presents the skyscraper as a "vertical village" with some 10,000 daily inhabitants and features Philip Reichmann as a key interview.

The well-illustrated piece concludes with a description of the roof-top view of other office towers, showing "people glued to desks, tapping away, pushing paper .... They're joking with their colleagues or sending e-mails about meeting for drinks after work, they're writing and rewriting letters of resignation, they're crying or cleaning toilets, they're kissing in the elevators and praying in the parking garages. The hulking edifices seem delicate then, beautiful even, their silhouettes slicing into the night sky."

I'm sure it's a great story. I hope to get to it some day soon.

Messiah From Montreal:

Digging for clues about Klein's persona

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Abraham Moses Klein, one of Canada's greatest literary figures, died 29 years ago, his fecund pen having run dry.

During the last 18 years of his life, Klein succumbed to a spiritual malaise that silenced him at the height of his powers.

Klein wrote several volumes of poetry, notably The Rocking Chair and Hath not a Jew, and one novel, The Second Scroll. He could have risen to greater heights had he not plunged into a state of despair.

Born in Ukraine in 1909, he came to Montreal when he was nine months old, living and working there until his untimely death.

Abraham Moses Klein

Klein, the poet and the man, is fondly remembered in a forthcoming Vision TV documentary, Messiah From Montreal, on Oct. 12 at 9 p.m.

Arnold Bennett's film, rather than being a conventional and straightforward account of Klein's life, focuses on his poetry through the medium of dramatic presentations, music and choreography.

The method is not always effective, but Bennett ultimately makes his point: Klein was brought down by personal demons.

Messiah From Montreal is narrated in person by the late Al Waxman, who died shortly after it was filmed. Waxman appears in a trenchcoat and hat, looking somewhat like a private detective.

In a sense, the metaphor is apt, since Waxman never stops digging for clues about Klein's personna.

His personality and place in Canadian literature is also the subject of interpretative remarks by novelist Margaret Atwood and Quebec scholars Pierre Anctil and Seymour Mayne. Additional comments are provided by, among others, Klein's son and his granddaughter.

Klein, a lawyer by profession, seems to have known some very interesting people. We're told that he tutored Irving Layton – the budding poet – in Latin and debated with David Lewis, the future leader of the federal New Democratic Party.

The relationships Klein forged with others, such as business tycoon Samuel Bronfman, regrettably go unmentioned. Messiah From Montreal would have been a better film had Bennett worked in such material.

The thrust of the film is Klein's descent into melancholy, triggered by the rise of Adolf Hitler in Germany and by the Holocaust.

Klein, having grown up in a city rife with virulent French and English anti-Semitism, was no stranger to ethnocentrism and prejudice. Indeed, some of his poetry touched on anti-Semitism.

But what set Klein down the path of instability was Germany's slide into the dark ages. "These are days of scorpions and whips," he mused pessimistically.

Klein's times, Bennett suggests, demanded a messiah, not a poet. Klein tried to fill that role, but failed.

After the Holocaust, everything else appeared insignificant and trite to him, and Klein never recovered from this trauma. He continued writing, but the words were suffused with anger and violence.

In 1954, he checked himself into the mental ward of a hospital. The intense electro-shock therapy to which he was subjected only worsened his condition.

He became a recluse, withdrawing into himself and writing nothing.

That such a brilliant man fell so low, and could not be helped, is a tragedy – a tragedy that is distilled by Messiah From Montreal.

Two minutes in Louisville – can you imagine a week?

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — Recently this city made headlines around the world, when its Jewish Hospital, built in 1903 to provide Jewish doctors a place to practise, implanted the world's first self-contained artificial heart.

Of course, horse lovers have enjoyed the beauty of the area for 127 years during the first Saturday in May, when Churchill Downs hosts the running of the Kentucky Derby – the greatest two minutes in sports.

Louisville, pronounced variously as Looavul, Luhvul, Loueville, Looaville or Looeyville, was founded in 1778 by the American Revolutionary War hero Gen. George Rogers Clark. Located along the Ohio River overlooking southern Indiana, Greater Louisville's seven counties on both sides of the famous river straddle America's pre-Civil War North and South. The location attracted pre-war slaves who tried to swim from the Kentucky side to freedom in Indiana.

In 1802, the first Jewish settlers arrived in the Louisville area, including John Jacob, who later became a city councillor. Kentucky's first Jewish synagogue opened in Louisville in 1842 as Adath Israel. The city's Jewish Community Center, founded in 1890 as the Young Men's Hebrew Association (YMHA), is the third-oldest continuously operating Jewish community centre in the United States.

The are plenty of attractions to see in all of Greater Louisville's seven counties – Jefferson, Oldham and Bullitt in Kentucky, and Clark, Floyd, Harrison and Scott in Indiana. A great way to sample the beauty of both states, including Louisville's Waterfront Park on the Ohio's Kentucky banks, is aboard the Belle of Louisville, a steam-powered riverboat built in 1914 that operates sightseeing, sunset and weekly dance cruises from July 1 to mid-October.

On the Kentucky side, consider a tour of Hillerich & Bradsby's Louisville Slugger Museum and bat factory, home to the world's largest bat. Everyone who tours the facility takes home a souvenir mini-bat.

Other places to see in Kentucky are the Six Flags Kentucky Kingdom amusement park, with its seven roller coasters and a water park, and Louisville Stoneware, where visitors can purchase finished hand-crafted pottery or choose a piece to paint themselves.

History buffs should make a pilgrimage to the Locust Grove Historic Home, the last residence of Louisville's founder, Clark. And the Speed Art Museum on the campus of the University of Louisville houses more than 3,000 treasures, including a Rembrandt, a Cézanne and a Monet. It also boasts Art Sparks Interactive Gallery for children.

A must-see in Louisville is the course at Churchill Downs, the oldest continuously-operated racetrack in the United States. Begin your visit with a tour of the interactive Kentucky Derby Museum. (Checking your weight on an official jockey scale is – thankfully – optional.) Walking tours of the track are also offered, weather permitting.

Louisville's nightlife includes internationally acclaimed plays at the Actors Theatre in downtown Louisville. The theatre has created some stellar productions that have made their way to Broadway, including On Golden Pond.

Many of the spectacular Kentucky Derby thoroughbreds are born and trained in the rolling hills surrounding Lexington, a leisurely 90-minute drive east of Louisville. On the outskirts of Lexington lies the Kentucky Horse Park – a showcase of museums, galleries, theatres and working farm exhibits. Over 50 breeds of horses graze upon its lush pastures. Horse-drawn tours are included in the price of admission. Horse, pony and carriage rides are also available for hire.

Over the river, there is also lots to do in southern Indiana. In Starlight, Huber Winery offers guests cheese-making demonstrations, wine tasting, a chance to pick your own produce, a petting zoo and hay rides. Nearby is The Forest Discovery Center, devoted to the wonders of the woods. Its many exhibits include Koetter Woodworking's rough mill, where you'll see logs transformed into trim and moulding.

And down by the river is Ceasars Indiana Glory of Rome, a spectacular four-deck gambling riverboat with over 2,500 slot machines and 140 tables. A 503-room hotel opened last month.

Accommodations in Greater Louisville are plentiful, with over 13,000 hotel and motel rooms, including the centrally located, very grand and very historic Seelbach Hilton Hotel (rated four diamonds by the American Automobile Association), and the Camberley Brown Hotel, built by the late J. Graham Brown, past chairman of the board of Churchill Downs and a benefactor of The Kentucky Derby Museum.

For more information contact the Greater Louisville Convention and & Visitors Bureau at 1-800-626-5646 or www.gotolouisville.com.

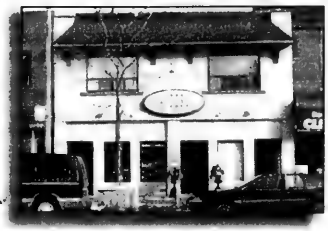
THE DINING GUIDE

ADVERTISING FEATURE

AXCESS RESTAURANT



3185 Yonge St. • 416-482-8485

Hours: Mon.-Fri. 12noon-3p.m.,
Mon.-Sat. 5p.m.-midnight for dinner.
Reservations highly recommended Fri. & Sat. evenings

Axcess' cuisine highlights Continental fusion, with Asian influences, and a range of pastas, seafoods, steaks, chicken and vegetarian dishes. The venison with mushroom risotto and Calvados sauce is excellent; the ostrich with wild rice risotto and lingonberry jus is very popular. All desserts, including the classic creme brulee, are homemade; best loved is the crepe filled with frangelico hazelnut mousse. They're creating a new wine list, with a good mix of vintages. The decor is rustic and intimate, with warm colours and pictures. The cream-coloured, hand-plastered walls shimmer softly with a hint of scattered gold dust

PAN ON THE DANFORTH

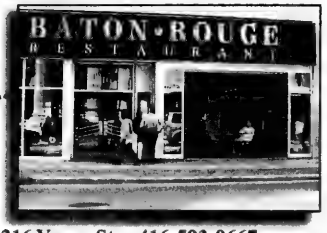
516 Danforth Ave. • 416-466-8158
visit us at toronto.com

Hours: Sun.-Thurs. 5p.m.–11p.m., Fri.-Sat. 5p.m.–midnight
Reservations on weekends for three or more

Toronto Life's Restaurant Guide, trusted by discerning diners, calls Pan, the Danforth's only three-star establishment, "one of the city's best restaurants". In a romantic setting perfect for candle-light dining, enjoy the full flavour of the Pan experience.

The cuisine is Greek of the highest quality, with many dishes cooked in wine. Several tempting fish or seafood dishes are offered daily. Among the most popular is grilled sea bass with tomato, onion, capers and roasted garlic salsa, served with lemon cracked potatoes and seared spinach. The meat for the moussaka is hand-ground; there's also a vegetarian moussaka.

BATON ROUGE RESTAURANT



216 Yonge St. • 416-593-9667
(in the Eaton Centre)

Hours: Mon.–Thurs. 11a.m.–11p.m.
Fri. & Sat. 11a.m.–midnight; Sun. noon–10p.m.
Wheelchair access. Validated parking $4.

One of Montreal's leading restaurant chains, Baton Rouge features ribs, steaks, burgers and pastas. Everything here tastes of quality. The beef is Stirling Silver, Canada's #1 grade. The ribs, after 12 hours' slow baking and char-broiling, literally fall off the bone; you can eat them without using your fingers. The meat is aged in-house and fish selected daily; sauces and dressings are also made fresh daily. You'll love the mahogany interior, with its deep, rich reds; Frank Sinatra and Billy Halliday seranade. Come for dinner before the theatre, and return for dessert after.

FURAMA HOUSE

100 Steeles Ave. W. • 905-731-3288

Hours: 10a.m.–11p.m., Dim Sum 10-4, 7 days.
Eat-in or take out. Licensed. Wheelchair access.
Reservations recommended.

Want to savour authentic, extra-special Chinese food, in a skylit setting amid crafted wood carvings? For Toronto's most superb dim sum, or delicious low-fat Cantonese and Szechuan cuisine, visit Bobbie Peng's Furama House. You'll love his Cantonese lobster, braised, sprinkled with canola oil, stir-fried and sprayed with eggwhite. You'll also be delighted by his tender, juicy 1 1/2 lb. Vancouver Tangen crab.

Ongoing specials include Live Lobster (buy 1, get 1 free), and the Live Lobster & King Crab combo. If you pay cash, you'll enjoy 20% off the dim sum Monday to Friday, 10 to 4 except holidays, and 15% off dinner in the evenings, not including specials. It's one more reason to savour the Furama House experience.

STEELES DELI WAREHOUSE

180 Steeles Ave. W. • 905-881-8366

Open Mon.-Fri. 10a.m.–9p.m., Sat. & Sun. 9a.m.–9p.m.
Wheelchair access.
Reservations advised for 6 or more.

Do you love the tastes, textures and aromas of old-fashioned deli home cooking? Come to Steeles Deli. Their liver & onions have long been famous; likewise the gefilte fish, potato latkes and beef knishes; and Steeles Deli keeps the Montreal smoked meat tradition alive in Toronto.

There are healthful salads, and heart-warming soups in jars to take out. Most of the patrons are regulars, coming back to enjoy good food and a friendly, relaxed atmosphere. Bring the family; there's a special kids' menu. You can enjoy a beer or house wine with your meal. There's take-out and catering too.

AKASAKA RESTAURANT

Richmond Hill • 905-764-9291
280 West Beaver Creek Rd.

Open: Every day for lunch and dinner

Akasaka on Empress Walk is an authentic Japanese dining experience. The main room has sushi and tempura bars. In the separate teppanyaki room, the chef works at the centre surrounded by guests, and everything is grilled before your eyes. The private tatami rooms host 15 to 25 guests, seated on mats Japanese-style. The teppanyaki menu includes chicken, fish, seafood, and Angus beef. Everything's fresh, with live lobster and crab and a tremendous sushi selection. For lunch, there are complete menus from $9.99; complete bentoh boxes from $11.99; and complete teppanyaki lunches at $10.99.

NISSAN STEAK & SEAFOOD HOUSE

1600 Steeles Ave. W. • 905-669-0083

Hours: Tues. – Sun. 11a.m. – 11p.m.
Closed Mondays
Wheelchair access

For relaxed, hearty meals with friends or family, visit Nissan Steak & Seafood House. Steaks include rib eye, T-bone and New York; there's also filet mignon, French veal chop, rack of lamb, lamb chops, shish kebab, and surf & turf. The fish menu includes sea bass, red snapper, filet of rainbow trout, and boneless filet of salmon; the seafood platter offers shrimp, scallop, mussel and salmon. On the side, try eggplant salad, or Israeli salad with chummus and tachina. With dessert, enjoy fresh espresso or cappuccino. The lunch menu, until 3 daily, features big, generous sandwiches; try the schnitzel.

THE LOBSTER TRAP RESTAURANT

1962 Avenue Rd. • 416-787-3211

Hours: Lunch Mon.-Fri. 11:30a.m.–2:30p.m.
Dinner 5-10p.m.,
7 days a week

Still serving satisfied patrons after 35 years. The Lobster Trap is Toronto's original lobster house. Unique in Canada, The Lobster Trap offers live lobster in the tank from one pound up to four pounds, prepared the way you like it; and the lobster bisque sets the standard for all others. Besides our delicious lobster, scampies, Alaska king crab legs, shrimps and mussels, there is also a selection of other fine fish dishes. Casual dress goes with the cozy atmosphere; and there is a special kids' menu. Lunches start at $4.95, dinners at $16.95. The Lobster Trap accepts all major credit cards.

Actor takes on the mob in Trick or Treat

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO – Actor Ari Cohen, a Winnipeg-born and raised performer, said he was given a Hebrew first name because his parents had close ties with Israel.

"All their children were given Hebrew names," said Cohen, who has two sisters. Ari is appearing in the first English language production in Toronto of Trick or Treat by Jean Marc Dalpe, a story of underground crime in Montreal, that starts out on Halloween eve. The play runs till Nov. 4 at the Factory Theatre.

One of the three principal performers in Trick or Treat is Earl Pastko, another Jewish actor, whose parents were born in Chicago, and whose four grandparents came to the United States early in the century from their homes in Europe.

Cohen, 33, learned his Hebrew at the Talmud Torah and at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, Winnipeg, where his father, Jerry, now retired, was principal for many years. His mother, Carole, is deceased.

"I have no preference for comedy or dramatic roles," he said. "My interest starts and ends with the script. If it's a strong script, I don't care about the genre."

Describing Trick or Treat as a "black comedy," Cohen said it exposes the Montreal underground for what it is, a disorganized place, made up of middle men who take their orders from mafiosi higher up.

Describing Trick or Treat as a 'black comedy'

The action starts when an angry Mike, 15, teed off because his running shoes were stolen, tries to buy a gun from Pastko, a TV repair man with criminal connections. Pastko refuses, setting off a chain of events.

Cohen is known in Toronto for his appearance at the Royal Alexandra in Proposals by Neil Simon. "Like a lot of actors, I depend on work in film and TV to get along."

He attended the University of Manitoba where he developed an interest in theatre, and then took five years of actor training at the University of Alberta in Edmonton. When the curtain rings down on Trick or Treat, Pastko is planning to move to Vancouver, for a six months trial period.

He said he is leaving Toronto because of its high pollution. "I'm desperate to get out of Toronto," he said, "because the air is probably the worst of any city I've been in." However, he doesn't feel that way about Canada, where he came as an adult already wedded to the theatre, and where he has landed immigrant status.

"I'm glad to be a Canadian," he said. "I feel much more at home here than in the United States. It's better to be slightly removed."

'The air is probably the worst of any city I've been in.'

Pastko is enthusiastic about Trick or Treat. "There is a lot to go on for an actor and the dialogue is extremely informative. I'm not saying it is easier to do, but in a sense it is because you are enjoying the rhythms given to you by the playwright."

He is not a practicing Jew, he said, but is drawn to many of Judaism's traditions, and attended Hebrew school for five years in Chicago before his bar mitzvah. His mother, Ida, lives in the Chicago area. His father, Ben, died 11 years ago.

U of T chair Gotlieb elected president of ASIP

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Avrum Gotlieb, chair of the University of Toronto's department of laboratory medicine and pathobiology, has been elected president of the American Society for Investigative Pathology (ASIP). He is the first Canadian to hold the position.

He has previously served as an elected member of the council, chair of the program and education committees, and as a member of the finance and diversity committees.

ASIP's goal is to "advance and disseminate knowledge concerning the pathogenesis of disease, knowledge that is derived from diverse experimental approaches, including genetic, immunologic, molecular, pharmacologic, physiologic and structural investigations," a media release said.

It also aims to encourage the "application of modern biotechnology in pathology and the utilization of cellular and molecular biology to understand the pathogenesis, prevention, diagnosis and treatment of disease."

Gotlieb, 55, met with The CJN in his office at the historic Banting Institute.

He is well aware that in the public eye, pathologists are a cross between the television character Quincy and those fictional heroes who discover that someone has died from an African blow dart.

Those people, Gotlieb said, are actually forensic pathologists – a subspecialty within the discipline.

In reality, pathology uses "human tissue, fluids and cells to diagnose disease, and through that to get information on modes of treatment, prognosis, and to learn how to prevent disease.

"Over 95% of pathology deals with living patients and clinical care," he explained.

Pathology, he said, is "at the crossroads between basic science and clinical medicine," and stretches from laboratory medicine (for instance, examining a tumor removed during surgery to see if it is cancerous) to research on AIDS.

Gotlieb himself is a cardiovascular pathologist, with a research lab at the Toronto General Research Institute. He focuses on vascular biology and atherosclerosis.

His research into the cells of the heart valves has been used in the tissue engineering project by the University of Toronto's Michael Sefton and others to try to develop an artificial heart.

Avrum Gotlieb

Gotlieb particularly enjoys teaching, calling it "an opportunity to expose young minds to new ideas." As a university department head, Gotlieb has had to reduce his clinical work, but he still teaches medical, dental, nursing, physical therapy and arts and sciences students, as well as supervising graduate and postgraduate students.

More clinical scientists are needed to better understand disease processes using modern technology. "ASIP should be actively involved in networking, mentoring and recognizing faculty who take the time and effort to train the next generation of scientists," he said.

The relationship between a student and his or her supervisor is a special one, Gotlieb believes. "It is a two-way street: the student takes away his training, and the supervisor has the satisfaction of having trained. That's what teaching is all about."

He added that "most of us at the university are here because we like to be immersed in young, inquiring minds asking questions, and spurring us on with new ideas. We want to be challenged by our students."

ASIP, he said, is "devoted to fostering the study of the mechanism of disease in its broadest form." Membership includes not just pathologists, but also clinicians and scientists in many different fields.

The annual meeting includes the exchange of scientific information, as well as the recognition of outstanding investigators and mentors.

The society encourages trainees in the field by giving them a venue to present their research and interact and network with senior investigators, which fosters both scientific research and career development.

Together with the Federation of Associations of Societies of Experimental Biology, ASIP lobbies for legislation and funding to support research into such up-and-coming fields as stem cell research. "We are responsible for an increase in the budget for the (U.S.) National Institutes of Health (NIH)."

This improvement in financial support "sets the pace for the rest of the world," Gotlieb said, and acts as "a benchmark for how Canada and the Canadian government can follow suit."

Ottawa's response to requests for more money has been a restructuring of federal funding. For instance, he said, the Medical Research Council has been replaced by the Canadian Institutes for Health Research (CIHR), which is modelled to some extent on the NIH.

But the CIHR's budget is simply not adequate, Gotlieb said. "We must increase the budgets to allow Canadian investigators to be competitive with others in the world, as well as ensuring that the quality of education is not diluted. Discussions seem to be moving in the right direction," he noted cautiously.

Gotlieb said his main goal as president of ASIP is "to promote and foster programs for trainees – to make sure that the infrastructure is in place to allow us to do our best to help university and research institutions to train young scientists."

Gotlieb is concerned about the shortage of pathologists and laboratory physicians in Ontario and across Canada. "In the next couple of years, we will face more retirements, but we don't have sufficient trainees [to replace them], or training positions, especially in Ontario," he said.

It takes a minimum of six to eight years to prepare someone to enter the field, Gotlieb said. "We have a serious problem at the University of Toronto," he said. "We have to recruit internationally – but there isn't a surplus internationally either."

A hopeful sign is that "the Ontario government has placed laboratory medicine in a group of medical specialties that is exhibiting a shortage."

However, he said the problem was partly caused in the first place by the government reducing the number of medical students that could be accepted, since the number of residency positions is tied to the number of graduating medical students.

Muscular Rangers outfielder trying to find his hitting groove

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Looking at the tattoos on the back of his legs, it would seem hard to believe that Gabe Kapler and his family celebrated Christmas, with a tree, for the first nine years of his life. But that practice changed when his mom Judy got a job as director of a Jewish preschool.

Today, the muscular 6-foot-two, 208-pound Texas Rangers centrefielder from Hollywood, Calif., wears his spiritual connection with Judaism proudly, with a Magen David tattoo on one leg that says "Strong Willed, Strong Minded" in Hebrew, and with a tattoo on the other that says, in obvious reference to the Holocaust,"Never Again."

With his mom's decision to get closer to her Jewish roots, Judaism began to play a role in Kapler's life. He was enrolled in Hebrew school and celebrated his bar mitzvah at age 13.

"I feel very proud to be Jewish," said Kapler, who feels more of a connection to the Jewish people than to Judaism's religious aspects. "I'm very proud of my heritage, proud of who I am.

"I feel being Jewish is like being Black or Mexican. It feels almost like a nationality to me."

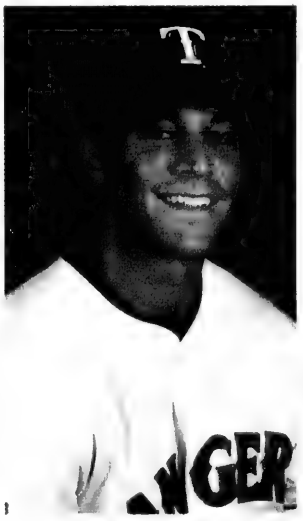
The Detroit Tigers' 57th round draft pick in 1995 is finding the going tough in his third full season in the big leagues. After an impressive second half in 2000, in which Kapler hit .344, including a club-record 28-game hitting streak, this year he's struggled at the plate.

He was batting .265 through Oct. 4, down 37 points from his .302 season-ending average last year. With 11 more plate appearances to give him the minimum 491, he would have ranked number 1 in hitting on the club. His .302 average marked a 57-point improvement over 1999.

"Gabe is a tireless worker," said Rangers' hitting coach Rudy Jaramillo, during the team's recent series against the Blue Jays at SkyDome. "When we got him from Detroit (prior to the 2000 season), we didn't know what to do with his swing because he's such a strong, muscular man."

The 26-year-old became discouraged and decided in early July to abandon the high leg-kick that helped him find his stroke last season. Early in the season he was burdened with a stiff swing, and only recently he went back to the leg-kick.

"We gave him the leg-kick to free his lower half so he could get some rhythm from his body. We're starting to see some results and he's going to hopefully get on a roll here in the last month of the season," Jaramillo said.



Gabe Kapler

Kapler was sidelined with a torn left biceps muscle the final week of the 2000 season and opted for rehab rather than surgery. He also missed the first three weeks of this season after tearing his right quadriceps muscle while running out a ground ball in a Grapefruit League exhibition game.

While the injuries may have been a factor in his hitting woes, Kapler continues to contribute on the basepaths and with his fine defensive play.

He led the Rangers with a career-high 22 steals and has sparkled in centre field, playing a difficult position at The Ballpark in Arlington. Kapler moved from right field to centre following Ruben Mateo's season-ending leg injury last June.

He committed his first error of the season in the series opener at Toronto, a far cry from his record in 2000 when he tied for the American League lead in outfield errors with 10. In 98 games this year, he had not made an error in 266 chances, best of any major league outfielder.

"I'm disappointed that this season has not been what I expected," said Kapler, whose favourite team growing up was the Blue Jays. "I hold myself to a high standard and have a lot of confidence in my abilities.

"I definitely pride myself on the little things in baseball – that includes baserunning, defensive plays and my throws. I was really disappointed I made that error. I want to make the routine plays and I want to make some spectacular plays."

Kapler's arrival in the major leagues came in the final week of the 1998 season following a monster year in Double-A, in which, playing for Jacksonville, he hit .322, with 28 homers and a minor-league leading 146 RBI, setting a Southern League all-time record.

He was named the 1998 Southern League MVP and earned Minor League Player of the Year honours from Baseball Weekly, The Sporting News and USA Today.

An avid weightlifter, Kapler graced the covers of several bodybuilding magazines and became renowned for being the focus of an entire shoe campaign before he had even reached the pros.

He said he hasn't done anything like that in quite awhile, although he did model for the Rangers 2000 merchandise catalog.

"Those things just kind of fell into my lap," Kapler said. "I'm definitely not a bodybuilder, never have been. When I was younger I was broke and they were a means to an end."

Kapler came up through the Tigers system but was dealt to the Rangers following the 1999 season in a nine-player swap that included Juan Gonzalez.

In his first game with Texas, he hit homers in his first two at-bats, setting a new club record. Meanwhile, the club signed Kapler to a three-year, $5.6-million contract in February, a year before he was even eligible for arbitration. It's not likely Kapler will have to worry again about being broke again.

"The best thing that happened was the trade to Texas," said Kapler.

A little prejudice?

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

I wouldn't want to be an Arab-, Palestinian- or Muslim-Canadian these days. Despite calls from the highest levels of government and clergy for tolerance and understanding, there's little doubt the walls between them and other Canadians are up.

However, I'm loath to see this as prejudice. Call it heightened suspicion or increased vigilance. Or are these mere euphemisms for bigotry?

An anthropologist I read in university suggested that prejudice in humans is often a natural defense mechanism. You naturally avoid the ranting lunatic in the trench coat while playing with your kids at the park, for instance. You cross the street to steer clear of Hells Angels (I do, anyway), even if they're not bothering you.

In that light, I'm beginning to wonder if a little bit of prejudice is a good thing, especially as Canada inches closer to war and as more ties are found between Arab operatives in this country and Osama bin Laden.

Lisa Beyer, Time magazine's Israel bureau chief from 1991 to 2000, wrote in that magazine last week how she came to get used to the country's hard attitudes towards Arabs. "You become nosy and suspicious... you practice ethnic profiling," she conceded. "After a wave of terrorist attacks, Israelis fire their Palestinian gardeners, they pressure the bus company to get rid of the Arab who drives their kids to school. They discriminate blatantly against Arabs in particular and non-Jews in general."

(I'm reminded of an interview I once did with a prominent Israeli dove who confessed to being scared stiff when Palestinian contractors, laden with sharp tools, came to upgrade his office. Here at home, many were aghast that an Egyptian refugee claimant suspected of terrorist ties once worked as a cleaner at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.)

Israelis have become so alert, wrote Beyer, they scan faces and clothes, looking for shifty eyes, nervous tics or bulky coats. This kind of vigilance has paid off, she added, thwarting would-be attackers or panicking them into blowing themselves up prematurely.

The point of this kind of extreme mindfulness, she noted correctly, is to regain a sense of control in a situation far beyond the control of individual citizens. "And that is essential. Terrorists want to frighten us, and we are scared. But panic and paralysis – those we can deny them."

Israelis, of course, are pros; we gracious Canadians have nowhere near that level of caution. But I suspect that will change once Canada becomes involved in the armed international coalition against terrorism, a campaign that promises to be long and dirty.

Last week's much-hyped episode of The West Wing examined just this kind of atmosphere. A White House worker is suspected of ties to Arab terrorism and subjected to a grilling that includes highly personal questions. Turned out he was the wrong guy, and only his Arab name and Islamic faith aroused authorities' suspicion. "That's the price you pay," snapped the White House chief of staff to the poor staffer, later to explain, in a uncharacteristic moment of sheepishness, that what he meant was, "That's the price you pay for bearing a resemblance to the enemy."

As the drumbeats of war grow louder, the price we will all have to pay is an unnerving (for us) new era of vigilance, suspicion and yes, maybe even a little prejudice. In this post Sept. 11 time, these are the only tools millions of us have to retain control. As we veer toward danger, we may have no choice.

Along with the praise has also come vicious hate mail, much of which she has posted on the site. One memorable letter from a woman in Beirut called Israel a cancer and promised to bear children who would grow up to fight Jews and perhaps die as martyrs.

Project One Soul takes its name, in part, from Pringle's computer's hard drive, called Neshama (one soul) in Hebrew. Pringle's technical expertise is key to the successful operation of the site.

Like Jordana, Pringle is a multi-talented individual. He once played synthesizer in the 1970s band Syrinx before hooking up with Jordana in her band, Michaele Jordana and the Poles. In the late '70s, the band was a fixture in the Toronto and New York New Wave scenes, and was nominated for a Juno for its song, CN Tower. From 1977-81 the band drew a who's who of the New Wave crowd to its performances at New York's famed CBGB. Joey Ramone, the Dead Boys, the New York Dolls and John Cale of the Velvet Underground all dropped in to hear the band play.

Jordana, meanwhile, was also developing her painting skills, creating a series of works whose theme was the death and suffering of whales. One of her paintings, I Cry Tears of Blood, now is on view at the National Gallery.

Jordana's artistic eye helped launch her on her Internet venture. With the onset of the intifadah, she began collecting images of the uprising and soon she and Pringle decided to combine them in the Project One Soul Web site. She has been consumed by the project, pouring her heart and soul into it.

She wants to expand its scope and use its images to create posters (which she had planned to unveil at the cancelled Sept. 23 community rally in Toronto).

With community support, Project One Soul could be taken to even greater heights, to "a worldwide street campaign as well as a TV campaign," she said.

"I think we're at a cultural point that we have to come together as one soul," she said. "We have to take the despair and turn it into hope. We have to take the darkness and turn it to light. We have to turn the hate into love and love ourselves. We have to survive."

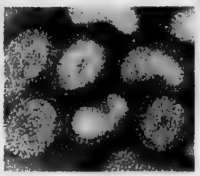
MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

The Best Medicine

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

Summer is over and the flu season is just around the corner!

Fall is here - which means kids are back to school, the weather is cooling down, and the cold and flu season is just around the corner. The 'flu' (a common name for influenza) is highly contagious and comes in seasonal outbreaks. In order to prepare for the flu season, we asked our expert Dr. Allison McGeer, Head of Infection Control in the Department of Microbiology at Mount Sinai Hospital, some questions about influenza and how we can prepare for it.



Q. How can I tell if I have the flu as opposed to a cold?

A. Influenza can be diagnosed by the abrupt onset of high fever, chills, a dry cough, headache, runny nose, sore throat, and/or muscle and joint pain. Unlike a cold, influenza can cause extreme fatigue lasting several days to two weeks.

Q. How is influenza transmitted?

A. The flu is spread easily from person to person through the air by people coughing or sneezing.

Q. Once I have the flu, what can I do to make myself feel better?

A. If you have the flu, keep warm, get lots of rest in bed, drink plenty of fluids to reduce throat irritation and coughing, and consume salty liquids such as chicken soup to relieve dizziness. You can also take acetaminophen to relieve aches and pains and reduce fever. If symptoms get worse or do not appear to subside, contact your doctor immediately.

Q. How can I protect myself against catching the flu?

A. All the things your mother told you as a kid hold true in avoiding the flu: wash your hands regularly, get plenty of rest, and avoid kissing or hugging people who are ill. If you interact with children, wash your hands more frequently, and get a flu shot.

Q. Is the province going to have its province-wide flu vaccination program again this year?

A. Yes. The province is paying for all Ontarions to receive a flu shot. If you are interested in getting your flu shot or obtaining more information about it, contact your doctor or local public health unit.

Blair, Arafat meet

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — British Prime Minister Tony Blair said Monday that the formation of a Palestinian state was a key aim of the Middle East peace process.

'Peace and security for Israel is the objective'

"A viable Palestinian state, as part of a negotiated and agreed settlement, which guarantees peace and security for Israel is the objective," Blair told a news conference in London after talks with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

"The end we desire... is a just peace in which Israelis and Palestinians live side by side, each in their own state, secure and able to prosper and develop," he said.

Arafat used the joint news conference to condemn last month's attacks on the United States and to urge Israel to resume Middle East negotiations "immediately."

Blair has said there is an urgent need to revive stalled Middle East peace moves to help neutralize attempts by Osama bin Laden – Washington's prime suspect behind the Sept. 11 suicide hijack attacks on New York and Washington, D.C. – to portray himself as a champion of the Palestinian cause.

JERUSALEM ALIVE WITH FESTIVITIES: Last week during the holiday of Sukkot, downtown Jerusalem was noisy with celebrations. An estimated 5,000 people, more than half of whom were Christian pilgrims from over 60 countries, marched in the annual Sukkot parade as spectators who lined the street gave the marchers rousing cheers. [Israel photos]

Syria now on Security Council

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada isn't saying how it voted in Syria's successful bid to win a seat on the United Nations Security Council.

Syria easily won election to the 15-seat council Oct. 8, taking 160 votes out of 177 cast by UN members, and earning the dismay of Jewish advocacy groups. Syria was the only country put forward by the UN's Asian bloc to replace Bangladesh for a two-year term on the powerful UN decision-making body, starting Jan. 1.

Canada refuses to disclose its secret ballot

The election was by secret ballot, and Canada "is not revealing its voting in Security Council elections" in order "to defend Canada's national interests" and "to protect [Canada's] ability to work with whoever is elected to the Security Council," Patrick Réal, a spokesman for the foreign affairs ministry, told The CJN last week.

Earlier this month, Southam News quoted unnamed diplomatic sources as saying Canada would vote in favour of Syria as part of a strategy of strengthening relations with Arab countries.

Canada was under pressure by Jewish organizations to oppose Syria's bid. In August, Canadian Jewish Congress wrote Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley, saying "Canada should not be a party to such a travesty."

In the letter to Manley, CJC president Keith Landy noted that Syria has an abysmal human rights record, is designated by the U.S. State Department as a country that supports

The News in Brief

Canada

Promoting Hatred

MONCTON — A teenager who burned a gasoline-soaked cross on the lawn of a Black family has been convicted of wilfully promoting hatred. James Hanley, 19, of Moncton, was sentenced to four months in jail followed by two years probation. Judge Sylvio Savoie rejected Hanley's claim the cross-burning was a "prank." To a Black person, burning crosses means only one thing, the hatred and violence of the Ku Klux Klan, Savoie said.

Israel

'No Threat' to Israel

JERUSALEM — The U.S.-led offensive in Afghanistan "does not raise any threats for Israel," says a statement from Israel's Defence Ministry. Israeli commentators said that assessment could change if the United States targets Iraq in subsequent phases of the campaign. Meanwhile, Israelis packed gas mask distribution centres despite official assurances that the current U.S. campaign would not lead to a repeat of Iraqi Scud missile attacks on the Jewish state during the 1991 Gulf war.

U.S. Victory Seen

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said he was confident the offensive against targets in Afghanistan would end with a U.S. victory. Peres told Army Radio, "In this war there is no room for compromise. Simply, the terrorists don't allow any compromise. If you make a compromise, no planes will fly, no one will be able to travel freely and it will be impossible to build skyscrapers."

Hotel Woes

TEL AVIV — Tel Aviv hotels are planning to lay off some 500 employees, following one of the worst holiday seasons in Israel's tourist history. Hotels in Tel Aviv currently employ some 2,500 workers, down from 5,000, according to the Tel Aviv Hotel Association. Some 20 hotels throughout Israel already have closed.

Anti-Semitism Post

JERUSALEM — Israel's deputy foreign minister, Rabbi Michael Melchior, has appointed Aryeh Mekel as co-ordinator of the struggle against anti-Semitism. Mekel will maintain contacts with Jewish organizations, international bodies and states. He will also co-ordinate the Israeli government forum against anti-Semitism, and will forward the international task force created in the wake of the Stockholm conference on anti-Semitism and Holocaust remembrance.

Keitel Nuptials

JERUSALEM — Actor Harvey Keitel was married recently to Dafna Kastner-Cohen, an Israeli actress and director, in a Reform ceremony here. Keitel was in Israel to attend the Haifa Film Festival screening of The Gray Zone, a movie about Jews forced to work in the Auschwitz crematoria. Keitel produced and starred in the film.

World

Rabbi Meets PM

LONDON — Britain's chief rabbi was among a group of religious leaders who met last week with Prime Minister Tony Blair. Rabbi Jonathan Sacks commended Blair for his leadership following the launch of a joint U.S.-British attack on targets in Afghanistan. He also gave the prime minister the biblical blessing, "Be'strong and of good courage; do not be afraid or discouraged."

Bodies ID'd

MOSCOW — A team of Israeli police experts have identified six of the 14 bodies retrieved from the wreckage of a Russian airliner that crashed last week in the Black Sea. The police had collected photographs, medical and dental records, and X-rays from the victims' families to help identify the bodies. As of last week, identification files had been prepared for 57 of the 66 Israelis who died in the crash.

Citizenship Stripped

WASHINGTON — A federal judge in Cleveland has revoked the citizenship of a local man for participating in the persecution of Jews and other civilian prisoners during World War II. Evidence showed that Wasyl Krysa, 75, served as an armed SS guard at the Gusen subcamp of Mauthausen in 1944-45, when at least 10,000 slave labourers were worked to death or murdered.

Neo-Nazis Celebrate Sept. 11 Attacks

Earlier this month, German neo-Nazis made their sympathies clear when they celebrated the Sept. 11 terror attacks against the United States in a demonstration here marking the 11th anniversary of Germany's reunification.

In banners and speeches, members of the far-right National Democratic Party called the attacks against the United States a justified response to American policies, and they protested Germany's support for a war on terrorism.

In Berlin, the approximately 1,000 neo-Nazis were countered by an equal number of leftist protesters who blocked the planned parade route.

Police rerouted the neo-Nazi march to side streets in order to prevent clashes. More than 4,000 police were on duty. No major problems were reported.

Meanwhile, German government leaders toned down the usual festivities marking the anniversary of unification. Instead, they spoke about the need to safeguard freedom and democracy.

Vandals strike synagogue, Catholic school, church

'Nothing like this is going to deter us'

By PAUL LUNGEN and JEFF ROSEN
CJN Staff Reporters

TORONTO — Members of Thornhill's Shaar Shalom Synagogue were shocked to discover threatening and ominous graffiti on their house of worship as they arrived for Simchat Torah services last Thursday.

"Jews must die/Taliban lives/Osama bin Laden lives" was spray-painted on the synagogue's main window some time during the night or early morning hours prior to Simchat Torah services.

Nearby, the Good Shepherd Catholic Church and St. Michael's Catholic Academy were also vandalized. The church's front window was daubed in black paint with the message "The Taliban will live Canada shall suffer."

Despite the synagogue vandalism, those attending services on the most joyous Jewish holiday of the year refused to be intimidated, singing loudly and dancing with the Torahs during hakafot (ceremonial processions carrying the Torah scrolls).

Rabbi Martin Berman, spiritual leader of Thornhill's only Conservative synagogue, ordered the seventh and final hakafah to take place in front of the synagogue in defiance of those who would seek to advocate violence.

With the message of hate in the background, members loudly raised their voices to the skies as they sang, among other songs, Am Yisrael Chai, and danced with the scrolls to celebrate the completion of another year of Torah reading.

Rabbi Berman said that while it is not the first time hakafot had been held outdoors, he felt it was appropriate this year to show that "nothing like that is going to deter us."

The attack must have occurred the night of Simchat Torah sometime after 10 p.m. when the caretaker left and before 7 a.m. Thursday morning, he said.

Despite the jovial atmosphere Thursday morning, Rabbi Berman said he talked to some children of Holocaust survivors who were shaken by the incident.

Among those present at the services were synagogue members Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, and Bernie Farber, executive director of Congress' Ontario region.

"Walking into the shul, [the graffiti] greeted everyone there. There was a certain amount of apprehension, but also the recognition that it could be the work of a local delinquent," Landy said. "Clearly there are those who are seeking to heighten anxiety... It's clearly a hate crime."

Farber said the vandals were "trying to take advantage of a hectic and tense situation. These people really should be ashamed of themselves."

He was particularly incensed that the vandals targeted an elementary school. "The idea of frightening children is cowardice," he said.

Bernie Farber

Chris Cable, a spokesperson for the school and the York Catholic District School Board, downplayed the graffiti incident as simple "vandalism." She said most of the children were too young to understand its message, but about 20 parents who came to the school were "concerned."

"It appears to be a larger community problem," she said.

Father John Weber, spiritual leader at the Church of the Good Shepherd, said about 50 members of the congregation attended services that day and witnessed the graffiti.

"My reading was that this was quite scary. You wonder about what's going on..."

Police were called to investigate the incidents and photographed the graffiti before it

There is no linkage

The campaign against the military infrastructure of the Taliban government and Al Qaeda, led by the U.S. and Great Britain, continued apace last week.

Unfortunately, so too did the campaign against reason, logic and truth, led by the suspected mastermind of the Sept. 11 atrocities, Osama bin Laden.

From the editor's desk

Bin Laden appeared in most of the homes around the world last world in a videotaped statement distributed by the Al Jazeera television station in Qatar.

One of his key messages was the purported linkage between the Sept. 11 strike at the U.S. and American ties to Israel.

More and more people last week were echoing his message. But the message is false.

Bin Laden's hatred for the western world, for the American way of life, stands apart from his hatred for the Jewish state. The United States was targeted because of what it represents to bin Laden: an open, democratic system of values totally at odds with, and anathema to, the controlled, totalitarian system he espouses. Israel is targeted first and foremost because it is Jewish, then because it is sovereign in what bin Laden and his like-minded colleagues consider to be an exclusively Muslim part of the world, and finally because it is a vanguard of western values in that "exclusively Muslim part of the world."

The ongoing violence between Israel and the Palestinians, abhorrent and so regrettable, is not the reason the terrorists were sent out on their murderous missions on Sept. 11. Even a peace treaty between Israel and the Palestinians would not have stayed the hands of the Al Qaeda terrorists nor abated their all-consuming hatred of the Jews and the Jewish state.

Osama bin Laden, Al Qaeda, Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah and the like are not trying to hasten a peace treaty between Israel and the Palestinians. They are trying to eradicate Israel. They openly, proudly, publicly, unashamedly say so.

It is imperative that this point be understood, emphasized and re-emphasized. There is no linkage between America's support for Israel and the Sept. 11 strikes at the U.S. unless one accepts the insidious, wholly pernicious belief that the Jews are undeserving of their own state in the Middle East, that Israel should cease to exist.

It is therefore alarming to have read the results of a recent poll conducted by Newsweek, that despite the overall general support for the State of Israel in the U.S., a majority of Americans do believe the Sept. 11 attacks stem from their country's close relationship with Israel.

The government of Israel is also alarmed by the seemingly broad acceptance of the notion of linkage. In response, the Foreign Ministry last week established three working groups to devise a coherent policy and public relations strategy to try to deal with the fallout from the Sept. 11 terrorism, the U.S.-led coalition against terror and the bombing of Afghanistan.

According to reports in The Jerusalem Post, the first working group will coordinate diplomatic policy toward the U.S.; the second will execute the (hasbarah) information campaign during the crisis; the third will liaise with the Diaspora communities.

At the same time, the Foreign Ministry distributed the following talking points to Israeli diplomatic offices around the world to be used whenever the linkage issue is raised in public debate.

• The attacks on the U.S. are part of the campaign that extremist, anti-democratic Islamic forces have declared on the democratic West.

• The Gulf War in 1991 was an ideological watershed for the fundamentalist Islamists who vehemently objected to the stationing of "infidel" American troops on the "Islamic" soil of Saudi Arabia. The sight of U.S. forces, and especially women soldiers included in the forces in Saudi Arabia, was considered an abomination by bin Laden and his followers. Bin Laden, eventually published a series of fatwas (religious edicts) targeting the United States for having defiled the places where the prophet Mohammed had lived.

• Bin Laden has also been the mastermind of attacks against other Muslim countries whom he believes to be insufficiently loyal to the precepts of Islam. These attacks, of course, had no connection whatsoever to Israel or its relationship with America.

• In August 1998, fully two years before the beginning of the Palestinian violence against Israel on Sept. 28, 2000, and three years before Sept. 11, 2001, bin Laden told the Italian newspaper, La Republica, in the name of the "International Islamic Front," that the war against the U.S. had already begun. The planning of the strikes against the U.S. therefore was clearly unconnected to either the substance or the pace of the Israeli-Palestinian diplomatic process.

• Finally, any attempt to understand or "justify" terror is really an attempt to justify the unjustifiable. It only emboldens terrorists to continue with their actions. Once the world views wanton slaughtering of human beings as merely regrettable acts of the unfortunate and misunderstood rather than as calculated carnage of sinister and malevolent plotters, the slaughter is simply encouraged, if not condoned.

Holocaust Education Week begins October 27

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — This year's Holocaust Education Week will open with a cultural program rather than a more typical lecture.

The Oct. 27 kick-off, at Holy Blossom Temple, will feature the song cycle We Are Children Just the Same by composer Srul Irving Glick. The music is a tribute to the boys of Terezin concentration camp and features poetry from their secret magazine, Vedem.

Srul Irving Glick

"It's going to be different and interesting," said Barbara Rusch, chair of Holocaust Education Week, which is coordinated by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation. The event has expanded so much since its inception 21 years ago that it now runs for two weeks, until Nov. 10.

This year there will be 105 presentations, down from last year's 127 mainly because of the consolidation of Christian-Jewish dialogue programs, said Rusch.

To the best of her knowledge, the event is the only one of its kind in the world, although there are many Holocaust-related conferences, including those for hidden children and the second generation.

"There are some interesting and little-known stories that are going to be told this year," said Rusch. Among them she counts the Nov. 6 presentation of Joseph Du, who will speak about Feng Shan Ho, the consul general of China in Vienna at the outset of World War II. He saved 18,000 Austrian Jews by issuing visas for them.

For the closing event – a community commemoration of Kristallnacht – veteran author and journalist Ruth Gruber will speak at Shaar Shalom Synagogue about her experiences bringing 1,000 Jewish refugees from Europe to Oswego, N.Y. during World War II. The story was the basis for a television mini-series earlier this year adapted from her book Haven: The Dramatic Story of 1,000 World War II Refugees. She will also discuss her witnessing of the birth and growth of Israel.

Everything from Glick to Gruber

Although lectures are the mainstay of Holocaust Education Week, there has been an increase in cultural programs, including, this year, an award-winning radio play, Remnants, Nov. 4 at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation and the performance of Ani Maamin: A Song Lost and Found Again, an Elie Wiesel dramatization of three biblical patriarchs witnessing the Holocaust, being performed the same evening at the Royal Conservatory of Music.

There has been a trend toward cultural programs, Rusch confirmed. "I think it's a really wonderful thing."

Originally, the event focused largely on survivor speakers, she said, "and they're still our greatest resource, but they are diminishing [in numbers], and we are looking for new ways to tell the story of the Holocaust."

Ruth Gruber

In some cases, she believes, young people may find the cultural presentations more immediate. "We are trying to attract the next generation to remember what their grandparents and in some cases great-grandparents went through, and we want to tell these stories in a meaningful way... because eventually we're going to have to turn over our responsibility to them."

Rusch, a commercial property manager who lectures on 19th-century English and North American social history, felt compelled to take an active role in Holocaust education after a lunch eight years ago with a non-Jewish friend. The other woman had seen and been influenced by Holocaust deniers on a television talk show.

Rusch – whose mother and maternal grandparents immigrated from Poland in 1929, leaving behind Rusch's great-grandmother who perished in the Holocaust and for whom she is named – was devastated by some of the things her friend said. "I realized that if our closest friends can be so easily persuaded and deceived, then this is a very serious problem... and the only way to combat these kinds of lies is through education."

Several weeks later, during Holocaust Education Week, she decided to join its committee.

Educating both Jews and non-Jews is important, she stressed.

This year she suspects the event might be more compelling than usual, in light of the terrorism directed at the United States last month. "It's bringing back memories for some of the survivors," she said.

The recent events also underscore the importance of educating people about the dangers of intolerance, she said.

21ST ANNUAL HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK

featuring
SRUL IRVING GLICK

Opening Night

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 27 – 8:00 P.M.
Holy Blossom Temple
1950 Bathurst Street, Toronto

Mr. Glick is the highly acclaimed and award winning creator of Holocaust-inspired music. This evening he offers a compelling tribute to the boys of Terezin concentration camp with his latest song cycle based on the poems from their secret magazine Vedem. He will be accompanied by Cantor Benjamin Maissner, pianist Cecilia Ignatieff and cellist Stefan Glick. Special guest will be George Brady, one of the few survivors of Terezin originally involved in creating the magazine.

Join us to initiate our community's 21st annual Holocaust Education Week and to hear this remarkable piece of music.

Program is free to the public.

Ontario campuses relatively peaceful in post-Sept. 11

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Even before Sept. 11, Evelyn Rubin considered herself lucky to be a student at Queen's University.

"We are really peaceful," she said last month about her Kingston, Ont. campus, reflecting on the stories she'd heard from her counterparts at other universities when she attended the Hillel International Student Leaders Assembly, a five-day retreat held in August.

Unlike Montreal's Concordia University, considered by some to be the most fervent hotbed for pro-Palestinian campus activities in Canada, and unlike some American campuses, where Jews and Israel were blamed for the attacks on the United States, "nothing too major" happens at Queen's with respect to conflict between Jewish and Arab or Muslim students, Rubin said.

But the interfaith service held the week following the terrorist attacks on the United States was more typical of the atmosphere at Queen's, according to Rubin and Mia Minnes, president of Queen's Hillel.

The service itself was not unique to Queen's, although it is unlikely that Hillel representatives elsewhere in Canada or the United States left the service holding hands with a Muslim counterpart, as did Minnes.

Queen's Hillel is involved in outreach to Arab and Muslim student groups, Minnes said.

At the University of Toronto, which has about 3,500 Jewish students, Michelle Lackie of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto participated in an interfaith service along with chaplaincy counterparts from the Muslim and Christian communities. She has not noted increased tensions on campus, she said.

Ron Somogyi, immediate past president of U of T's Jewish Students Union (JSU), now chairs a city-wide Jewish Student Council that is working on responses to the terrorism.

At U of T, he noted, Jewish students have collected money to donate to relief efforts and have also made books available for students to write their feelings about the Sept. 11 attacks on New York and Washington, D.C.

"The main thing was, we wanted to work with other student groups to do this," he said. A Muslim student group was contacted, but did not reply by the time the event was scheduled. "We want to concentrate all our efforts into doing things with other groups as Canadians, as people who understand that violence is not an answer."

Somogyi is not aware of any backlash against either Muslim or Jewish students. "It seems as though people are trying not to put the blame on anybody."

please see page 26

Leora Goldberg, a U of T student and JSU board member who attended the same Hillel assembly as Rubin, said that interactions with her fellow students who are Muslims have focused on class work rather than on political issues.

Reflecting on the terror attacks on the United States, Goldberg said that after Sept. 11 "everyone has a little taste of what it's like to be in Israel's shoes."

Josh Shuval, president of the Jewish Students Association at the University of Waterloo, took part in a memorial service two days after the attack alongside Christian and Muslim counterparts. "We all read different passages from our scriptures," he said.

Although there have been tensions and anti-Semitic incidents on his campus in the past, Shuval said he hadn't seen or been made aware of any in the wake of Sept. 11.

He had not seen any evidence of anti-Muslim feelings either, he said. "My biggest surprise is the level of tolerance."

Freid runs agency with upside down business rules

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Loren Freid is chief executive in an industry where the lower the customer demand, the better it is for everyone concerned.

It's a topsy-turvy world where slow is good and busy is bad. In a perfect world, he'd be out of business and his customers and suppliers would likely celebrate the fact.

Freid isn't a villain pushing drugs or selling lemons on a used-car lot.

On the contrary. He's a highly-motivated, intensely-concerned humanitarian who seeks to alleviate a problem that is largely ignored in our affluent, consumer-driven society.

Freid, 41, is executive-director of the North York Harvest Food Bank, which gathers and allocates food to agencies that distributes it to people experiencing hunger.

He has headed the food bank for 16 years – ever since he helped found it – and, unfortunately, business is brisk.

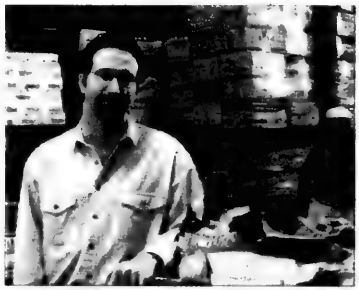
More and more families are lining up for food packages, to the extent that he considers the 1990s "a food bank decade."

From 1986 to 2000, food bank distribution increased 10 times, from 100,000 pounds to one million pounds. "Most of this food is distributed through a network of programming put on by social service agencies" associated with the food bank, he said. The North York Harvest Food Bank, along with its much larger cousin, the Daily Bread Food Bank, serves as a central clearing house for donated foodstuffs.

The North York Food Bank recently concluded its annual Sukkot/Thanksgiving food drive, matching its historic average of 12,000 to 15,000 pounds.

In Toronto, as many as 140,000 people a month use food banks, Freid said, and the numbers have been fairly consistent for some time.

For Freid, those kind of numbers should raise the same kind of alarm bells sounded by the horrific events of Sept. 11.



Loren Freid in warehouse of The North York Harvest Food Bank.

"It's something ongoing, that you don't see on a regular basis and that doesn't have the sense of urgency created on Sept. 11," he said. "While Canadians want to help [U.S. victims], we'd like to re-direct their energies to help their neighbours down the street.

"We're dealing with a tragedy of enormous magnitude and we're dealing with it every day. We're trying to draw people's attention back to the needs of people in our own communities."

Despite the economic good times experienced in Toronto in recent years, the demand on food banks has not abated.

"These are good times, but not for everybody. There's a whole community of people that doesn't benefit from the good economic times. Our information indicates that people who are laid off from work find it difficult to get back on track," he said.

Freid points to annual studies of 800 food bank users, compiled by social service agencies every February and March. The survey's results are illuminating.

The average food bank household consists of three people headed by a 41-year-old. Forty percent of families are headed by someone with a college education and more than 50 percent of family heads have more than 10 years of work experience.

"These... could be your next door neighbours," Freid said.

Provincial policy has had a severe impact on these families, he continued, particularly the 22 percent welfare cut. It "was one of the most destructive measures ever implemented on people in need... People were put into such dire circumstances they couldn't own telephones or buy a paper or get a TTC ticket." (Government spokespersons point out that welfare rates dropped along with the reduction in benefits.)

For Freid, "it comes down to what kind of society we are and how we see ourselves. My view is that if someone needs a helping hand, you shouldn't punish them when they are in a bad spot."

Freid would like government to move away from deficit-cutting towards repairing the "social deficit" created by budget cuts. Only in that way, he said, "can you break the cycle of poverty."

Although firmly planted in the social service sector, Freid's business skills have been recognized by the North York Chamber of Commerce, which named him to its business class of 2000. As executive director of the food bank, he manages personnel, negotiates rent, deals with client agencies and performs other managerial tasks.

His skills are self-taught, as Freid entered the field fresh out of university armed only with a liberal arts degree. At 24, he determined the issue of hunger was largely unaddressed in Toronto and in January 1986 he opened the North York Harvest Food Bank in a 3,000-square-foot space at Finch Avenue and Weston Road. A broad cross-section of the community responded with donations and support, and the food bank became a fixture in the North York social service field.

In 1993, it moved to its current 9,000-square-foot location on Chesswood Drive. Aided by four full-time staff and three part-timers, along with a core of 12 volunteers and hundreds of other helpers, the food bank serves dozens of social service agencies.

Although the volume of donations have flattened out, the demand has not, which means the North York Harvest Food Bank will be around for some time to come.

High praise for high moral conduct

The Sa'ud clan that rules the large peninsula area of the Arabian desert in the Persian Gulf known as Saudi Arabia is used to the most deferential treatment by western governments and western leaders. The fat wealth that the petroleum hidden under the desert dunes has spilled into the hands of Saudi kings and princes has rendered them virtually immune from any western opprobrium. Until last week.

Prince Alwaleed bin Talal, a nephew of Saudi ruler King Fahd, came to New York to tour ground zero in the company of the city's mayor Rudolph Giuliani and to demonstrate his country's ostensible support for the national tragedy it had suffered.

In a well-televised, well-photographed flourish of public charity, Prince Alwaleed presented the mayor with a cheque for $10 million on behalf of the victims of the destroyed World Trade Center towers. "A tremendous crime, just unbelievable," the prince said, referring to the Sept. 11 attacks. "We are here to tell America... that Saudi Arabia is with the United States wholeheartedly." (Apparently not so wholeheartedly however, as to make Saudi airspace and Saudi facilities available to American forces.)

But the prince had something more to tell America.

"At times like this one, we must address some of the issues that led to such a criminal attack. I believe the government of the United States of America should re-examine its policies in the Middle East and adopt a more balanced stance toward the Palestinian cause... Our Palestinian brethren continue to be slaughtered at the hands of Israelis while the world turns the other cheek... Arabs believe that if the U.S. government wanted, it could play a pivotal role in pushing Israel to sign and fully implement a comprehensive peace plan."

Reiterating the same calumny that Osama bin Laden himself had uttered days before in his infamous videotaped message, and adding to it by heaping one falsehood upon the other, the Saudi prince linked the Sept. 11 atrocities to America's friendship with Israel.

But Giuliani would suffer none of the prince's guile and have none of the prince's charity. He rejected the statement, rebuked the prince and returned the cheque.

"Not only are those statements wrong, they are part of the problem," Giuliani said. "There is no moral equivalent to this attack. There is no justification for it. The people who did it lost any right to ask for justification for it when they slaughtered 4,000 or 5,000 innocent people, and to suggest that there is any justification for it only invites this happening in the future."

Mayor Giuliani deserves the highest praise. He knows he cannot protect the values of free, democratic society or sanctify the memories of the murdered victims by acquiescing to self-interested, supercilious, finger-wagging, Saudi hypocrisy. His conscience recoiled at the thought. How shining an example of moral courage!

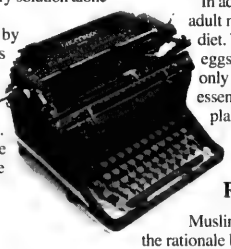
Causes of Palestinian bitterness?

In a recent article (CJN, Sept. 28) Sheldon Kirshner provides a useful review of the "Palestinian uprising" and notes two explanations:

- "The protests were supposedly spontaneous grassroots expressions of rage and frustration over Israel's occupation, the wretched and humiliating conditions Palestinians endure and the failure of the Camp David summit."
- "Israel believes that the intifadah was premeditated and that Sharon's visit was merely a pretext."

Kirshner then proceeds to present evidence supporting the second explanation. But is it not possible that a combination of the two explanations is closer to the truth? How else can one explain the apparently extensive and continuing actions of demonstrators, gunmen and suicide bombers?

In the same issue, Shira Herzog, another CJN columnist, concludes about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict that "the status quo is untenable and a military solution alone is not possible."



The intifadah has been generated by Yasser Arafat and exploited for his purposes. For its part, Israel must defend its citizenry. However, the intifadah may well reflect the bitterness felt by the Palestinian population. A long-term solution requires that the causes for this bitterness must also be identified and addressed.

We must blow our own horn

Bravo to Mickey Oberman (CJN, Letters to the editor, Oct.4) for his statement that "Israeli public relations and the Diaspora leadership have both been a dismal failure."

It is not too late to have full-page ads regularly in the media telling this incredible story of a community that builds its country and loves its country and fights for its country.

We must work at getting our younger generations interested in proudly serving their own Jewish community. We have treasures of good men and women who are not at all involved, who are actually almost removed from even being interested. More must be put into such an endeavour. Yes, we must blow are own horn to inform even our own that we are a great people and a great community.

The fact of the matter is that leadership interested in this as a priority must be found to do the job of inspiring Jews. They are there, leaders-in-waiting with "the goods."

Karilani's misunderstood response

Karilani's response (CJN, Sept. 28) to the writer who recently decided on a vegetarian diet requires some important clarification.

I am most proud of the young letter writer to Karilani. The primary reason for choosing a vegetarian diet is a moral abhorrence to killing animals in order to consume their flesh. Making this decision shows a tremendous sensitivity to Jewish ethical values.

Tofu is an excellent source of protein. Peanut butter is a question mark. I use peanut butter as a protein only if it is purchased freshly ground without additives. Brand name peanut butter is loaded with many fillers, most of which are sugars of one type or another. These fillers turn the peanut butter into a fatty starch, which minimizes or eliminates any possibility of using it as a protein.

Beans are wonderful in many ways, but they are not proteins. However, there is protein in beans. Beans are actually starches and should not be used as protein foods. The scientific consensus today is that beans do not really provide sufficient proteins even when combined.

In addition, I am concerned that this brave young adult may have chosen, or is considering, a vegan diet. Vegans consume no animal products – dairy, eggs, or honey. A vegan lifestyle is supportable only if one is aware that protein supplements are essential, and combines that with a sensible food plan.

Re: Terror in the United States

Muslim spokespersons have been trying to explain the rationale behind last month's terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, D.C. The thrust of their claims is that since the United States has become the "world policeman," this has caused great frustration among Muslims and this is the root cause of the terrorist attacks.

The fact that every Arab country is ruled by a dictatorship of one kind or another and that there is no freedom of speech or free press or freedom of religion or independent judiciary or right to vote does not seem to be a problem for them!

Hopefully, some day they will recognize that the true "Satan" is not the United States, but their own leadership.

Not critical of Israel

The article, "YMCA Web links to Palestinian Web site" (CJN, Sept. 13), describes Peace Now as "highly critical of the Jewish state." Not true. Peace Now is a Zionist organization and is not "critical of the Jewish state." It is critical, however, of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's attempt to end the Palestinian intifadah by using only the military stick without the diplomatic carrot. Both are needed.

Disappearing Christians in the Middle East

By DANIEL PIPES

The transfer of control over Bethlehem from Israel to the Palestinian Authority just before Christmas 1995 inspired a spate of articles on Bethlehem's diminishing Christian presence. They noted that a place not long ago 80 percent Christian, is now but one-third Christian. For the first time in nearly two millennia, the most identifiably Christian town on earth has lost its Christian majority.

The same changes have taken place in two other famously Christian towns, Nazareth and Jerusalem. In Nazareth, Christians went from 60 percent of the population in 1946 to 40 percent in 1983. Jerusalem Christians in 1922 slightly outnumbered Muslims (15,000 versus 13,000). Today, they number under 2 percent of the city's population.

The same applies in other parts of Israel. A report from the Galilee village of Turan quotes a Christian store owner: "Most Christians will leave as soon as we can sell our houses and shops. We can't live among these people [Muslims] anymore."

The observation has been made that the Christian community in the West Bank is close to extinction. But the Israeli-held territories are not unusual in this regard. Christians are fleeing from all over the Middle East.

Emigration began in the aftermath of World War I and has greatly picked up in the last decade. In Turkey, Christians constituted a population of 2 million in 1920, but now only a few thousands remain. So severe is the problem that the Orthodox Patriarchate in Istanbul is in danger of collapsing for lack of a large enough pool of candidates.

Earlier in this century, Christians represented about one third of the Syrian population; now they account for less than 10 percent. In 1932, they comprised 55 percent of the Lebanese population; now they are less than 30 percent. More than half of the Christians of Iraq have left. Copts began leaving Egypt in significant numbers after the 1952 revolution.

Emigration and declining birth rates the main causes

The Christian population decline has two main causes: emigration and declining birth rates. Emigration represents the end of a long process of exclusion and persecution. On the West Bank, a nearly permanent Muslim boycott of Christian businesses is the problem. In Egypt, fundamentalist Muslims constantly target Christians. The Lebanese civil war of 1975-90, when reduced to its essentials, represented a successful effort by Muslims to reduce Christian power in the country. But by far the worst situation is in the Sudan, where a civil war that has been raging off and on since 1954 has led to wholesale atrocities.

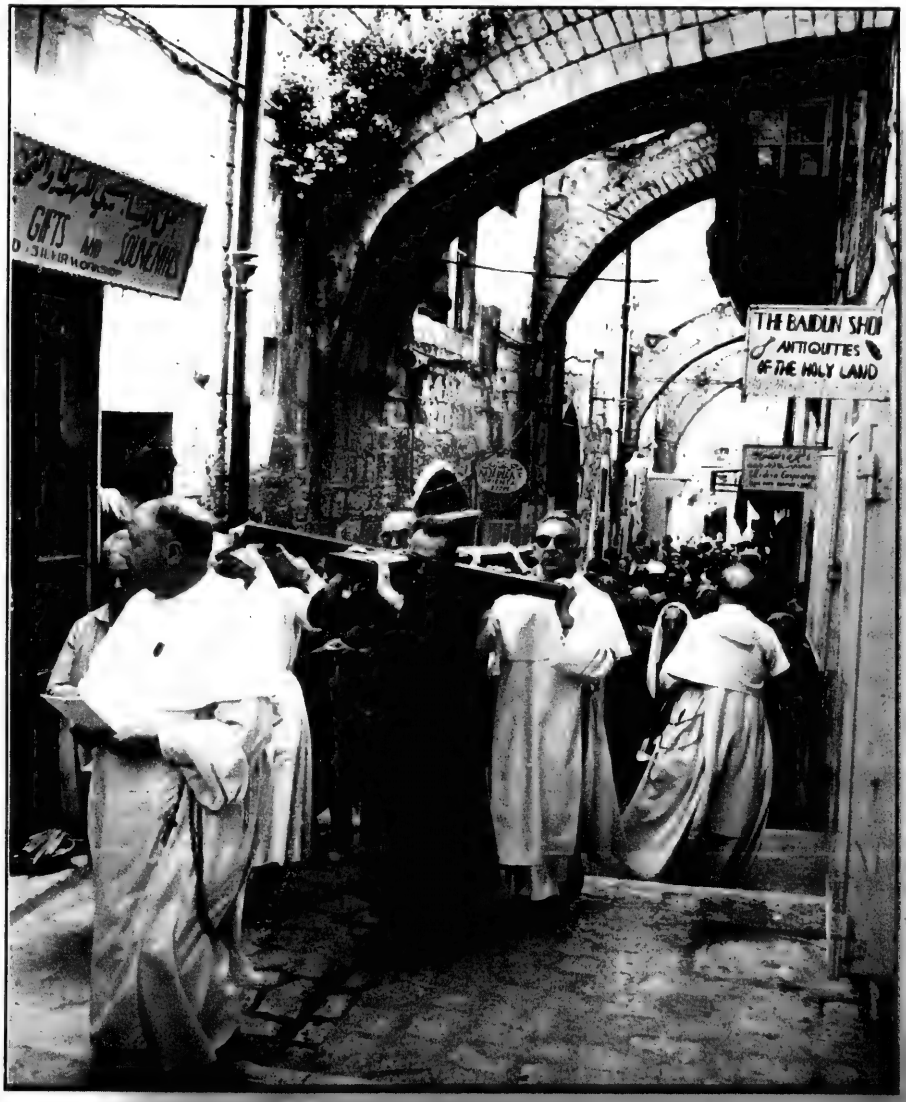
Declining birth rates can also be seen throughout the region. In Israel, for example, there are 37 live births per thousand Muslims; among Christians, the number is 22 per thousand. The small number of Christians leads some to marry Muslims, which also effectively means they are lost to their former Christian community.

At the present rate, as Prof. Hilal Khashan, a political scientist at the American University in Beirut, has pointed out, the number of Christians in the Middle East will likely drop from 12 million today to 6 million in 2025. With time, Christians will effectively disappear from the region as a cultural and political force. One report has noted that there are more Christian Palestinians living in Beit Jala, Chile than there are in Beit Jala on the West Bank. And Jordan's Prince El-Hassan bin Talal of points out there are today more Christians from Jerusalem living in Sydney, Australia, than in Jerusalem itself.

For many years, the plight of Middle East Christians attracted little attention in the outside world. The earlier protectors of their interests – the British, French, Russian, and Greek governments – have turned away from the Christians' current problems.

Recently, however, some American organizations have taken up the cause of persecuted Christians around the world, primarily in Muslim and Communist countries.

Bringing more international attention to this situation could be a significant step towards understanding and, if possible, stopping the phenomenon of the Middle East's disappearing Christians.



Christians in Jerusalem on the Via Dolorosa. The author notes that the number of local Christians in Israel is rapidly diminishing. In the future, fewer and fewer local Christians will be part of scenes like this. [File photo]

This article is adapted, with permission, from the Editor's Introduction of the Winter 2001 edition of the Middle East Quarterly, Volume VIII: Number 1. The entire edition is dedicated to the disappearing Christians of the Middle East.

Hanging in

The events of Sept. 11, will doubtlessly turn out to be a landmark in modern history. I watched the attack on the World Trade Center in Israel, where I spent some time with a group of former UJA chairpersons. All of us were appalled at what we witnessed on television, but we also shared a feeling that history had entered a new period. Alas, we were not wrong.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I will not bore my readers with a repetition of facts and comments that have darkened our world since then, but I feel impelled to add some considerations that are specifically Jewish.

I am writing this column on Oct. 1, and I am sorry to report that earlier premonitions that assailed me are slowly hardening into observable facts.

More and more, I hear the following disturbing comment about the situation that led up to the events of Sept. 11. The question is asked just why the United States became the target of international terrorism for the first time in its history. Increasingly, I hear one simplistic explanation: it all came to pass because the United States has been supporting Israel and its policies vis-a-vis the Palestinians. Reducing this observation to its basic factor, we arrive at the obvious: it is Israel, i.e., the Jews, who are ultimately to blame.

Unfortunately, that is a very old story, but the fact that I have heard it so often before does not make it any easier. The world will always seek simplistic explanations for complicated events, and the answer, "It's the Jews again" has a mysterious and, therefore, persuasive tone to it.

Fortunately, there are enough decent and verbally competent people around who will oppose this defamation, but there is no question that it will affect us, even as it will infect gullible minds, of which there are many. So, dear reader, there is only one piece of advice that I can give you – the same advice I give myself: hang in there, stay tough and know that you have many allies. We are not alone – not this time.

I am afraid that I cannot offer much more in consolation, but the best protection that we have is to steel our minds with the conviction that the society that we have the fortune to inhabit has enough intelligence and understanding to know evil propaganda from the truth.

I write this on the eve of the Sukkot festival, at the centre of which stands the vulnerable hut that is a shaky defence against hostile weather. Take this as a metaphor: we know that the sukkah is frail, but the spirit in which we erect it nonetheless, year after year, presents a formidable force of faith, and this force will carry us through. Meanwhile, we will have to hang in, as we have done so often before.

Taking stock of our feelings

While sitting here trying to think of what to write in this month's column, it is hard to get any thought on paper that does not concern the tragic events that occurred only a few weeks ago. Most columnists have been centered on Sept. 11 and I feel that it would be impossible to write about anything else.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

This is the first time in my life that I have personally felt threatened and scared. I have been continually replaying the surreal images in my mind that I viewed on television, and as with the assassination of John F. Kennedy for earlier generations, I know that I will never forget where I was when I found out about what had just happened at the World Trade Center, at the Pentagon and in a field outside Pittsburgh.

There is no question about the tragedy in this situation: innocent lives were lost, families were ruined and lives were destroyed. I am just feeling a little sad lately that the world did not take other atrocities as seriously as this one. When a million people died in Rwanda, did we see benefit concerts aired on so many television networks? Did we see such measures to stop the killings as those being taken now? Lately I feel angry that President George W. Bush is so eager to retaliate when he and his colleagues have so easily criticized Israel for striking back when it has been the target of senseless terrorism.

Perhaps part of this is a generation gap. While I do not represent every university student around, I know that there are many who share my position. My contemporaries and I feel that our views are being poorly represented, if at all. I do not claim to be an "expert" on anything. I do not claim to have the insight of an experienced political analyst; however, I wish at times that the insight of younger adults could be taken more seriously in such uncertain times.

Yes, people of my generation have been spared a lot prior to a few weeks ago. We have not seen a world war, nor have we sent our peers to destinations like Vietnam to fight a war that could not be won. In North America and most developed areas, we have the comfort of living where there are endless possibilities, and knowledge and education are readily available. The problem is, however, that with all of the considerations arising right now, our opinion is being ignored and overlooked. Ultimately, we will be holding the high government positions and other high-ranking jobs, yet no one is really interested in what we have to say.

In 20 years, we could be picking up the pieces from the aftermath of what is happening now, and possibly be held responsible and accountable for predicaments over which we had no power.

As a younger generation, we communicate differently and perhaps at times a little less aggressively. Our feelings are still young and sensitive and we try to use them carefully when we make decisions.

Also, whenever I look in the newspaper or watch the news, I see a preponderance of middle-aged-to-older men sputtering out comments, ideas and threats that all seem to point to violent outcomes. This part of our population represents only one tiny microcosm of our global community, yet they are responsible for everything. It is also possible and very likely that if different people were representing North America right now, there could be a substantially different response to a horrific disaster.

I do not maintain that I have the answers to what needs to be done, and I do not want anyone to suffer as many American, Canadian, Israeli families and friends of the 6,000 victims of Sept. 11 are doing right now. While my thoughts may seem simplified or expressed merely from the heart, maybe that is what the generation now in charge of the future of many lives should do, too.

Terrorism and the many flavours of fundamentalism are possibly the most serious threat that we will see in this century and there is no condoning them. Let us just hope that the approach taken to deal with this threat will solve the problem and deliver peace.

North America's anxiety

Sept. 11 will be in our minds forever. Everyone will always remember where they were, what they were doing, who they were with and so on. We read about it every day in the newspapers and even if we try, we can't escape the changing landscape of our world.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

There is a legitimate anxiety among many university students that was not present before the terror attacks in New York and Washington, D.C.

On the day they occurred, students at the University of Winnipeg gathered around a television set near the library. At least 100 had their eyes glued to the news, while others went home to watch what was going on. I spoke to the vice-president of the university's student government and she was obviously shocked and afraid about what would happen in the future.

This anxiety is very real and should not be ignored. Since Sept. 11, I have felt a lot more cautious, a little more skeptical of things, and I am always just a little bit nervous. And I am not alone. I think a lot of students feel this way, which is probably similar to how many people felt about the possibility of nuclear attacks during the Cold War.

Right now, writing before Sukkot, I am not sure what the Americans will do in response to the attacks. I have some hope that they will not attack Afghanistan in a way that will cause World War III, but I am nowhere near ready to dismiss the possibility.

This is where my anxiety stems from: It might sound silly, but I believe the destruction of the human race could happen. I hope that when it comes down to it, the world's leaders won't succumb to pride, but things are very unpredictable right now.

I keep hearing talk about bioterrorism as a legitimate threat, and with technology being more advanced than in World War II, when North America was spared from direct attacks, it is not unrealistic to say that Canada and the United States could be hit. These are historic times and these things are impossible to ignore.

What can we as university students do during this volatile time? Many students from across Canada feel military action is not the way to go, and I agree. More people will just be killed, and war does more harm than good. I think we have been doing a good job voicing this sentiment, but we need to continue to promote nonviolence.

At the University of Winnipeg, several lunchtime forums have been held to discuss the attacks and their implications. This is very positive because we raise issues that are not spoken about in the mainstream media. Each one of us needs to find our voice and what we want to represent and go to bat with it. While Canadians are not feeling the same pressures as Americans, this situation still affects us.

Another problem for me that causes some frustration is the media's biased reporting and their lack of interest in taking a hard look at America and the reasons why this attack occurred. Many people seem to avoid these kinds of touchy subjects for fear of repercussions. When, for instance, Bill Maher on ABC's late-night talk show Politically Incorrect tried to argue the Sept. 11 terrorists were not cowards, his job was put in jeopardy after some sponsors pulled their advertisements.

I don't want to get into the reasons why America was attacked, but I think it is important for people to be aware that there is more than one side to this story. Just to make it clear, I am not for one second downplaying the tragedy of this horrific event. I just think we need to be aware that Americans are not the only victims here. In order to really understand what is going on, we need to do our own research to find out what events led up to this attack.

I hope all this anxiety will disappear soon, but as the days go by, the tension seems to be building. We are living through historic times and we should do what we can to actively take part in shaping the future.

The Kirshner File

Afghanistan shakes Israel's ties with U.S.

For Israel, the stunning terror attacks on Sept. 11 dawned like a moment of crystalline clarity and certainty. Arab terrorists, believed to be linked with Osama bin Laden's al-Qaeda network based in Afghanistan, had crashed commercial airliners into the World Trade Center in Manhattan and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., killing thousands of civilians. In the numbing aftermath of these unprecedented atrocities, Israel thought it had scored an incredible, if backhanded, victory.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The assumption was that the United States would now be more empathetic to Israel's own terrorist problems, which have multiplied since the Palestinian uprising.

It was also assumed that Washington would henceforth march shoulder to shoulder with Israel in the battle to counter international terrorism.

Clearly attempting to capitalize on the Sept. 11 events, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon made two points in a telephone conversation with U.S. President George W. Bush. He praised Bush's decision to form a global coalition against terrorism and the Taliban regime in Afghanistan, which protects bin Laden. And he characterized Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority, as "our bin Laden."

Yet, within days of these developments, the situation turned dreadfully sour. It climaxed with Sharon's startling Oct. 4 rebuke of the United States, in which he warned Bush not to appease the Arabs at Israel's expense, much like Neville Chamberlain had appeased Adolf Hitler in 1938 at Czechoslovakia's expense. "We cannot accept this," he declared.

Hours after rebuking the United States and proclaiming that Israel would "depend only on ourselves," Sharon ordered the Israeli army, in its biggest operation since the intifadah broke out in September 2000, to reoccupy two Arab neighbourhoods in Hebron from where Palestinian gunmen had just fired on Israeli civilians.

Israel's offensive, combined with Sharon's allegation, sent Israel's pivotal relations with the United States plummeting to its lowest level since 1981, when Menachem Begin lashed out at Ronald Reagan for suspending a security agreement with Israel following its annexation of the Golan Heights.

Responding to Sharon's historical analogy, which was not exactly apt, Bush instructed Secretary of State Colin Powell to convey his disapproval. White House press secretary Ari Fleischer, meanwhile, described Sharon's remarks as "unacceptable." Israel, Fleischer lectured, "can have no better or stronger friend than the United States and better friend than President Bush." Stung by the harsh reaction, Sharon backed down, saying that he appreciated Washington's resolve to fight terrorism and promising to cooperate in its effort to combat it.

Several days later, Sharon, who has met with Bush twice since last March, went even further. He noted that his comments had not been properly understood, praised Bush's war on terrorism and pledged "full and unwavering support" as a silent partner in the coalition. Then, in a call to Powell, Sharon expressed appreciation for Israel's "deep friendship and special relationship" with the United States and Bush.

On Oct. 9, two days after the United States and Britain attacked Afghanistan, Powell tried to heal the embarrassing rift between Israel and the United States by claiming that the Bush administration would not "sell out" Israel or "trade away" its security" in payment for Arab support of the coalition.

If nothing else, the recent row revealed the depths of frustration and anger on both sides.

Sharon's ire, in the first instance, was piqued by a story-cum leak in the Oct. 1 edition of The New York Times in which it was reported that the Sept. 11 attacks had prompted the United States to postpone the announcement of a new Middle East peace initiative calling for an independent Palestinian state.

Not surprisingly, Sharon took umbrage. He had not been given advance warning. The timing of the report suggested that the United States was already rewarding the Arabs, perhaps at Israel's expense, for backing the primary goals of the coalition: the destruction of bin Laden's network and, with it, the Taliban government in Kabul. Worse still, Bush, deliberately or not, had created a linkage between the anti-terror campaign and the Palestinian issue. It brought back bad memories. In 1990 and 1991, Saddam Hussein unsuccessfully attempted to link Iraq's invasion of Kuwait with the Palestinian question.

To Israel, the very idea of a Palestinian state is no longer taboo. Ehud Barak, the former Israeli prime minister, accepted it as an inevitable outcome of talks with Arafat. Sharon has embraced the thesis himself, though his conception of a Palestinian state, broken up into disconnected bits and comprising less than half of the territory of the West Bank, will not satisfy the Palestinians. Last January, the outgoing U.S. president, Bill Clinton, remarked that a resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict was unthinkable without a "sovereign and viable Palestinian state."

What upset Sharon more than anything else, probably, was that the concept of a Palestinian state, with all its profound political and military ramifications, was being taken for granted, without Israel's consent, at such an extraordinarily delicate juncture. It seemed like unseemly pressure, designed to please Arab states like Saudi Arabia and Egypt.

Sharon, too, was upset by the United States' narrow definition of terrorism. Bush swiftly rejected his comparison of Arafat with bin Laden. More seriously, Bush did not target Islamic fundamentalist groups like Hamas and Islamic Jihad, which have wreaked havoc on Israel in the past year.

Sharon was less than pleased that the United States, acutely sensitive to Arab opinion, asked Israel to stop making armed incursions into Area A, fully controlled by the Palestinians, in reply to Palestinian provocations.

In the first few days after last month's bombings in the United States, Israel launched punitive raids into Jenin and Jericho, touching off vocal Arab protests. As a result, the Bush administration, in its eagerness to assemble a coalition to confront bin Laden and the Taliban, leaned hard on Israel.

Sharon was none too pleased that Bush was trying to tie Israel's hands at a time when the Palestinians were yet again violating another ceasefire, this one initiated by Arafat on Sept. 18 in a transparent bid to mollify the Americans and calm the waters before the anticipated U.S. strike into Afghanistan.

In addition, Sharon resented Washington's pressure on him to approve an oft-delayed meeting between Shimon Peres, the foreign minister, and Arafat. The meeting, which produced yet another truce, finally took place on Sept. 26. But it had little effect on the ground. A succession of Palestinian attacks – including a suicide bombing near a kibbutz in the Jordan Valley – and Israeli counter-attacks claimed the lives of seven Israelis and 30 Palestinians, respectively.

There has been an immense reduction in the number of Palestinian attacks since Oct. 7, as Arafat has cracked down fiercely on pro-bin Laden supporters.

Lastly, Bush incurred Sharon's wrath by deciding not to oppose Syria's two-year membership in the United Nations' Security Council. It seemed like another example of blatant politicking to firm up the anti-bin Laden coalition. But Israel should prepare itself for more surprises and shocks as the struggle in Afghanistan intensifies.

Amichai promised hope

Open Closed Open, by Yehuda Amichai, Random House, 2000.

Yehuda Amichai, Israel's beloved national poet, died just over a year ago. His name means "my people lives," and he derived much of his inspiration from the history of his people and the Land of Israel. His recurring themes included love, war and the beauty, mystery and enduring embrace of Jerusalem. He also found poetic imagery in the lives of his parents, his two wives and his children – a linked tribute that extended over three generations.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Readers found many things to admire in his work, which was ironic, tender, playful and despairing by turns. Some delighted in his exuberant inventiveness and sudden flashes of humour. Israelis recited his poems at weddings, funerals and national observances.

Open Closed Open, which took Amichai roughly 10 years to write and was completed when he was already quite ill, is undoubtedly his masterwork. It is basically a long poem, divided and subdivided into sections, but thematically and musically braided skilfully into a brilliant unity.

In Tourists, the poet finds a recognizable target: "So condolence visits are what they're here for./ sitting around at the Holocaust Memorial, putting on a serious face at the Wailing Wall./ laughing behind heavy curtains in hotel rooms./ They get themselves photographed with the important dead/ at Rachel's Tomb and Herzl's Tomb./ and up on Ammunition Hill./ They weep at the beautiful prowess of our boys./ lust after our tough girls/ and hang up their underwear to dry quickly/ in cool blue bathrooms./"

There are no boats in Jerusalem, but there are many sails. Amichai called Jerusalem the Venice of God: "And there are days here when everything is sails and more sails./ even though there's no sea in Jerusalem./ not even a river./ Everything is sails: the flags, the prayer shawls, the black coats./ the monks' robes, the kaftans and kaffiyehs./ young women's dresses and headdresses./ Torah mantles and prayer rugs, feelings that swell in the wind/ and hopes that set them sailing in other directions./ Even my father's hands, spread out in blessing./ my mother's broad face and Ruth's faraway death/ are sails, all of them sails in the splendid regatta/ on the two seas of Jerusalem:/ the sea of memory and the sea of forgetting."

There is pathos and an ever-widening circle of pain and sorrow in The Diameter of the Bomb: "The diameter of the bomb was thirty centimeters/ and the diameter of its effective range about seven meters./ with four dead and eleven wounded./ And around these, in a larger circle of pain and time, two hospitals are scattered/ and one graveyard. But the young woman/ who was buried in the city she came from./ at a distance of more than a hundred kilometers./ enlarges the circle considerably./ and the solitary man mourning her death/ at the distant shores of a country/ far across the sea/ includes the entire world in the circle./ And I won't even mention the howl of orphans/ that reaches up to the throne of God and/ beyond, making/ a circle with no end and no God."

Despite ample reason for despair, Amichai held out the promise of hope in human beings helping each other along the way. "I believe with perfect faith that at this very moment millions of human beings are standing at crossroads and intersections, in jungles and deserts, showing each other where to turn, what the right way is, which direction. They explain exactly where to go, what is the quickest way to get there, when to stop and ask again…This too is a new religion."

Even non-readers of poetry will find beauty and meaning in this volume that is sure to stir the emotions and elevate the spirit.

National Archives preserves our history

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

As Canadians, we can find many of the documents behind our history preserved at the National Archives of Canada. As Jewish Canadians, we may also turn to this indispensable Ottawa-based institution for numerous collections of special relevance to our community.

World War I Papers: Did any of your ancestors or relatives serve in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces in World War I? Chances are you can view their attestation papers by visiting the archives' web site (www.archives.ca/08/08_e.html) and using the ArchiviaNet on-line research tool. (Choose the Genealogy theme.)

To date, the archives have digitized about one-third of the roughly half-million attestation papers in its collection. Easily accessible and downloadable, the digitized records contain useful family information. The rest of these sign-up papers and more in-depth personal war records are available by mail; photocopying charges apply.

Toronto Cemetery Records: Original record books and file cards kept by Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel of Toronto, dating from 1930 to 1980, contain date of death, yarzheit, name of deceased, and burial location. Benjamin's Park will readily grant the necessary letter of permission to any bona fide researcher.

Similarly, microfilmed records from Toronto's Steeles-College Memorial Chapel extend from roughly 1949 to 1975 and include name, date and place of birth, death and burial, age, occupation, civil status and last residence, next of kin, names and birthplaces of parents. Written permission also required.

Russian Consular Records: Of great interest to genealogists, this microfilmed collection (also known as LI-RA-MA) contains nominal files on more than 10,000 immigrants, including many Jews, who came to Canada from the Russian Empire between 1898 and 1922. The well-known index edited by Sack and Wynne has been enhanced by the National Archives' own index. The microfilms may be accessed remotely by interlibrary loan. Caveat: Russian reading skills required.

Hebrew Free Loan Association: This Montreal-based philanthropic society helped some 80,000 borrowers between 1911 and 1935. Its minutes books contain details of membership, bequests, legacies and donations. (Permission required.)

Jewish Colonization Association: Founded by Baron Maurice de Hirsch in 1891, the JCA promoted the resettlement of oppressed European Jews in numerous colonies in Western Canada. The archives hold an inventory of the eight reels of microfilmed records, which run from 1886 to 1919; open access. A related collection, the Jewish Family Services of the Baron de Hirsch Institute of Montreal, contains correspondence, reports, cemetery records, case files and more; segments have restricted access.

Numerous Family Collections: The archives hold an impressive array of materials from many Canadian Jewish scholars, rabbis, politicians, business people, writers and other noteworthy individuals, as well as significant communal organizations.

Valuable materials, of interest to historians if not immediately to all genealogists, include an unpublished manuscript of Canadian war hero Ben Dunkelman, the family papers of 18th-century Quebec trader Aaron Hart, and material related to Bernard Wolf, a London, Ont. businessman who in 1948 mounted a successful court challenge of a restrictive covenant that disallowed the sale of a plot of land "to anyone of Jewish Hebrew, Semitic, black or coloured race or blood."

Useful Catalogue: Published by the National Archives in 1987, Archival Sources For the Study of Canadian Jewry by Lawrence Tapper remains an excellent catalogue of the archives' pertinent holdings, of which only a choice selection is mentioned here. Limited copies of this bilingual guide are available for free from the archives.

Since the archives may need up to 48 hours to make materials available, and longer if additional fonds are required, it's best to contact the archives in advance of a visit. Visit the Web site or write to National Archives of Canada, 395 Wellington St., Ottawa, Ontario K1A 0N3. Genealogical inquiries, 613-996-7458.

Water crisis and Israel, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we looked at the water crisis in Israel and the region. Today, some possible solutions.

Despite its current problems, Israel has seen some success in its battle to conserve water. For example, visitors to Israel are familiar with "drip irrigation," the tubing that snakes its way through city parks and kibbutzim. The drop-by-drop method of watering deposits just enough water above or below surface. Thanks mostly to drip irrigation, Israel's water requirements for apples, bananas and potatoes declined by more than half after its introduction [http://www.worldbank.org/html/fpd/technet/drip_irr.htm].

But to solve its current problems, Israel will have to do much more. Here are some of the options being discussed:

Importing water: Israel is negotiating a deal with Turkey to import up to 50 million cubic metres of water a year. The national water agency has been instructed to construct a 13-kilometre-long pipeline from a wharf in Ashkelon to a reservoir where the imported water would be connected to the national water system [http://israeliculture.about.com/library/extra/blwaterb.htm]. But importing water is expensive and Israel's National Infrastructure Minister has said it should only be considered an emergency measure to bridge the gap until the country begins producing desalinated water [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2000/06/23/News/News.8607.html]

Desalination: "Nuclear desalination plant will be ready by 1971" reads the headline in the Dec. 18, 1965, edition of the Jerusalem Post. "President Lyndon Johnson has assured Prime Minister Levi Eshkol of U.S. willingness to help finance the joint U.S.-Israel nuclear desalination plant," the article states [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2001/04/29/Features/Features.25249.html]. The nuclear desalination plant never saw the light of day, and although Israel is a pioneer in extracting salt from salt-water, there has been a great deal of criticism that the country has been slow in developing more desalination plants. The country has 40 small and medium-sized desalination plants and this year approved the construction of a 50 million cubic metre seawater plant in Ashkelon.

Wastewater treatment and reuse: Agriculture cannot afford to pay for the high cost of desalination. But since many crops can tolerate water of lower quality, treated wastewater is seen as a source of water for irrigation. You can read more about this and other initiatives at the Web site of the Water Research Institute based at the Technion in Haifa [http://wri.technion.ac.il/].

Rainfall enhancement: Israel began seeding clouds with silver iodide crystals over the Lake Kinneret basin in 1976. Cloud-seeding can significantly increase rainfall in a normal winter and produce as much as an additional 80 million cubic metres of water. Although cloud-seeding is far cheaper than desalination, it can only be effective when there are suitable rain clouds in the area and even then, there is no guarantee that the rain will fall exactly where needed [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2000/12/14/News/News.17371.html].

Water bans: Israelis love their lawns. This year, plans for a total ban on watering lawns were discussed but not approved. There has also been talk of no new municipal parks or gardens and the introduction of water quotas for local authorities. Industries could face a cut in quotas [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2001/05/21/News/News.26613.html].

New canals: One of the oldest schemes for restoring the Dead Sea to its traditional level is through digging a canal linking it to the Mediterranean Sea. The so-called Med-Dead Canal would also take advantage of the 400-metre drop between the two bodies of water to generate hydro-electric power [http://www.unu.edu/unupress/unupbooks/uu18ce/uu18ce0c.htm]. Since the route of the proposed canal would take it through the Gaza Strip, the United Nations passed a resolution in 1984 condemning a possible canal [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/UN/unga39_101.html]. Despite the resolution and a huge price-tag, the idea of a canal has never really died.

Israel Foreign Minister Shimon Peres advocates a different canal that would connect the Dead Sea to the Red Sea [http://www.jewishpost.com/jp0706/jpn0706h.htm]. His "Peace Conduit" would be built with the co-operation of the Kingdom of Jordan and would become a great unifying project for the countries.

"Water," Peres said, "knows nothing of politics; it flows for all."

'Going on' after evil

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

I have become a news junky. Ever since that fateful Tuesday morning on Sept. 11, I have been inescapably captivated. It is the images, the reports, the analysis, the human stories and all of the possible and eventual scenarios. Perhaps it's obsessive, but maybe it is just a normal reaction to an abnormal situation, trying to make sense out of the senseless.

As Jews after the Holocaust, we've always told ourselves there is no such thing as a survivor. Rudolph Giuliani, the mayor of New York, borrowed Jewish wisdom when he said, "None of us can survive this, we can only go on." But as much as one pays lip service to this theme of going on, no one can really go on, at least not yet. The world, or our perception of it, is shaken. One doesn't have to have been amongst the unemployed, the laid off or the idle businesses. One need not be in the travel industry, in hospitality, in leisure, in retail, in entertainment or in finance to have been touched. We have all been affected. For the moment, the only thing that is certain is continued uncertainty.

Tuesday morning began normally enough – another day on planet Earth. People woke up and went about their life as usual. It is shocking to think that some 20 individuals armed with box cutters could so effectively and abruptly end the lives of 6,000 people and that this would forever alter the lives of millions and revise the course of nations.

These individuals were part of a group whose numbers possibly total only a few hundred hard core radicals, an infinitesimally small percentage of the world's population. That this group alone could wreak havoc on the rest of civilization, that their terror can hold the world hostage with fear, aptly illustrates the powers of evil.

Judaism teaches that good and evil exist simultaneously in the world, that they are opposite ends of the same scale, one whose balance is quite precarious. Indeed, only a very small amount can tip this scale and destroy that balance.

In themselves, good and evil don't come from God. Instead, they were entrusted to humanity. It is we who hold the potential for good or evil.

We begin the reading of the Torah anew each year with the story of Eden, paradise found and paradise quickly lost. The world as first seen by Adam and Eve is gone forever: it didn't take much, scarcely a bite into a single forbidden fruit.

Certainly, the other side of all this is the positive power of good. If even a small measure of evil can be so destabilizing, then good too has the power to heal.

When after the Holocaust we kept going, Jews didn't simply keep living. We maintained our faith and our belief that good can overcome even the greatest evil. And so we built lives and communities and brought children into the world.

After Sept. 11, "Going on" doesn't mean venturing out, carrying on with life's tasks or not canceling one's vacation. Going on means exercising our human – but very divine – power to bring more good to the world.

Kolel celebrates 10 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the 10 years since Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning was established, it has changed the face of liberal Judaism in Toronto, says its rabbinic director, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein.

"We have presented ourselves as being passionate, committed, literate, studying Jews," she says.

Kolel started up after a group of lay people met with several Reform rabbis to plan a centre that would offer programs complementary to synagogue adult education programs, says Rabbi Goldstein.

"It all started with the simple idea that people across different religious experiences could study together. What that meant was serious long-term study, not just introductory courses," she says.

They also envisioned an outreach centre that had no pre-conceived idea of what kind of Jews would come, she says. "They wanted everyone to come and feel comfortable.

"Not surprisingly, the rabbis needed no convincing. They bought the idea immediately."

Rabbi Goldstein, originally from New York, has been with Kolel since its inception. She came to Toronto after spending five years at Temple Beth David in Massachusetts. "I was just negotiating my second five-year contract when I was contacted by Kolel's search committee. I had a few conversations with the rabbis, and we all got very excited. It was fast and furious from there.

"It was obviously the right shidduch. I have always been passionate about adult education."

What began with 40 students studying six courses in rented quarters, has blossomed into a thriving, growing centre, she says. Kolel now offers 14 classes a week and has about 5,000 students a year attending classes, events and services. One year ago it moved into its own building at 151 Eglinton Ave. W.

"There was a tremendous hunger in this town for real learning. Students do not want fluff. They want to study texts and be informed by them. They are also anxious to hear different perspectives. We teach from the liberal perspective, but we respect all traditions."

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

In her own advanced Torah class in which students study primary texts in Hebrew, says Rabbi Goldstein, there are secular and Orthodox Jews. "It is our flagship class."

Kolel has become a place where people can explore Judaism without an agenda, she says. "There a lot of people who do not fit a particular perspective. They are valued for their perspective.

"About 50 percent of our students are unaffiliated. They are not uncommitted, they have just not found a home. This is a very good first step for people," she says.

The educational theory behind Kolel is transformative learning, says Rabbi Goldstein. "Adults make informed choices; learning cannot be coerced. We offer something, and they take it where they want. People learn best when they take material and use it to transform their lives."

Kolel is celebrating its 10th anniversary on Oct. 21 with an all-day celebration of Jewish learning, arts and culture at its centre at 151 Eglinton Ave. W. The open house, made possible by the Edward Bronfman Family Foundation and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, will include study, art and music with rabbis, cantors and educators from across the denominational spectrum. For information on the schedule, call Kolel at 416-485-7007.

The meat in the 'sandwich' generation

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The catch phrase is "the sandwich generation," referring to those women caught between the changing needs of their aging parents and the ever growing demands of their home, children and careers.

They are the focus of a continuing documentary series on WTN called The Family Dance: Tales from the Sandwich Generation, produced by Breakthrough Films and Television Inc.

The 26 episode half-hour series premiered Oct. 2, at 6 p.m. and will continue into the new year.

Several Jewish women are featured, including Marci Rapp, a working mother of four, whose mother, Charlotte, is in a wheelchair and completely dependent on Marci for her care. Marci is concerned about where her mother will live, since she can no longer live in her own apartment. A media release describes Marci as feeling like "a truck in the mud – just plowing through."

Her story will air Oct. 16, and Dec. 4. Each episode will be repeated several times during the same week.

On Nov. 13, the series features Holocaust survivor Itia Golan, who takes her mother back to her homeland in the Czech Republic, and on Dec. 25 it features sculptor Angela Houpt, who is forced to care for her father's health as well as his estate.

USY president wants to build chapter leadership

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — United Synagogue Youth (USY) is an excellent way to become involved in leadership and meet new friends, says Michael Ferman.

The 18-year-old OAC student, a Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) graduate now taking further OAC courses at Vaughan Secondary School in Thornhill, would not have said that at the end of Grade 8. Now president of ECRUSY (the 14-chapter Eastern Canadian Region of USY) for the 2001-2002 year, Ferman reluctantly attended his first USY program as part of a deal with his father Alan. "Try it out three times," Alan told Michael.

But at the very first meeting he attended, Michael was elected secretary of the chapter at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue. Four years later, his USY involvements and the positions he has held fill an entire single-spaced page of his resume.

Michael Ferman

A sampling includes participation in USY's Italy/Israel Pilgrimage program in summer 2000, service on the international general board and a stint as chapter president, during which time the chapter's USY Shabbat program, an all-day Saturday event, won an award as best religious program.

This past summer, he worked as a counsellor for teens with special needs at the Conservative movement's Camp Ramah in New England. At CHAT, he served as head of the library committee for two years

The appeal of USY for Ferman is the good feeling he gets from having made an impact – when people tell him what a good time they've had at a program he worked on, for example. "I'm also learning a lot of skills that I'm sure will help me later in life," he said. Interacting with peers, rabbis and lay leaders, as well as working on budgets are a couple of examples. "It's a great opportunity," he said.

From a religious standpoint, Ferman – who was already observant before he joined the organization – feels USY has brought him closer to Judaism. "There are a lot of programs over Shabbat and the chagim."

In fact, he hasn't ruled out the idea of rabbinical studies at the Jewish Theological Seminary, although he is leaning toward studying business and law.

USY, the youth arm of the Conservative movement, is 50 years old this month. ECRUSY is not marking the anniversary as a region, although individual chapters may have programs or special services on a smaller scale, said Ferman.

That decision was made to conserve resources, he explained, noting that the regional Fall Kinnus is coming up early next month. He expects more than 100 of the almost 300 ECRUSY members to take part in the annual convention.

Among Ferman's goals are increasing membership on a regional level and building chapter leadership to ensure the group's future. The most recent ECRUSY program, a Saturday late-night program at Laser Quest that ended Sunday morning with davening and breakfast at Adath Israel Congregation, drew close to 200 people. The program was for Maariv, the division of ECRUSY encompassing the Greater Toronto area, London, Hamilton and St. Catharines. (Mizrach takes in Halifax, Montreal and Ottawa.)

Occasionally he pulls all-nighters

Ferman attributes the unprecedented attendance level at the Laser Quest event to the price structure, with a discount of almost 50 percent for non-members and for members who brought a non-member friend. Ferman credited Shirley Gossack, who was executive director of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Canadian region – and youth director – until the end of August, for coming up with the program. Currently Tamara Kochberg is USY's regional youth director.

Ferman said it's sometimes difficult to find a balance between school and his work for USY, which can involve dozens of phone calls and e-mails per day, taking a few hours of his time. Occasionally he pulls all-nighters to get his schoolwork done, he said. "Luckily, I'm able to cope with less sleep than the average person."

Varian Fry: portrait of a forgotten hero

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Over the course of 13 months, thousands of lives were saved from the Nazis because of one American.

Beginning in 1940, journalist Varian Fry set up a rescue mission in Marseille, France, that developed escape routes for refugees via Spain.

A photo exhibit of Fry's story, currently running at the Koffler Centre of the Arts at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, describes how Jewish and non-Jewish artists, intellectuals and writers were smuggled out of France to freedom.

The only U.S. citizen to ever be recognized as Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem, Fry is a man who "in a moment of crises, rose to the occasion," said Michael Marrus, dean of graduate studies and a professor of Holocaust Studies at the University of Toronto.

Speaking at the recent opening of the exhibit, Marrus described Fry's tale of courage, a story which, until recently, has rarely been told.

Cover of Assignment: Rescue, The Story of Varian Fry And the Emergency Rescue Committee.

A series of black and white photographs, coupled with a running narrative of Fry's work in Europe, is now being shown at the Koffler gallery.

Varian Fry established a legal French relief organization in Marseilles.

It is a story of underground meetings in dark cafés, forged documents, back-alley encounters and unrelenting persistence, which ultimately facilitated the clandestine escapes of such artists as Marc Chagall and Max Ernst, writer Hannah Arendt and sculptor Jacques Lipchitz.

Born in New York in 1907, Fry became a journalist after graduating from Harvard University in classics, Marrus told the audience.

On the eve of World War II, Fry seemed destined to become a second-rate journalist as editor of the Foreign Policy Association's Headline Books, Marrus said.

At that time, "Varian Fry was an ordinary person who didn't quite fit in."

In the meantime, the implementation of Article 19 of the Franco-German Armistice, which required the Vichy government to arrest anyone demanded by the Gestapo, led to the foundation of the Emergency Rescue Committee (ERC) in New York. It was felt that artists and writers were especially at risk.

Fry, who had witnessed a particularly violent anti-Semitic pogrom while a reporter in Berlin in 1935, joined the ERC. Because of his facility with languages and understanding of high culture, Fry was sent to France to investigate the plight of the European intellectual world.

Marrus described how Fry worked the system once he reached Marseille – continuously bribing, wheeling and dealing, negotiating and forging in order to smuggle as many people as he could to freedom.

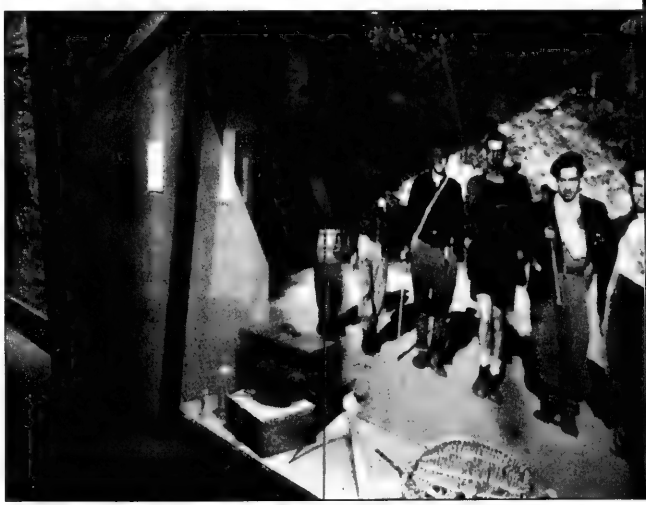
He was harassed by the French police and the Gestapo and was not assisted by the Americans.

"It is an exciting and heroic story, with all the intrigue of a film like Casablanca," said Diane Uslaner, the Koffler Centre's director of cultural programming, marketing and development.

Once the war ended, Fry returned to his former life and to being basically a regular man, Marrus said.

"There is something ordinary about Varian Fry, just as there is something extraordinary."

The exhibit, which runs until Nov. 11, is being put on by the Koffler Centre in co-operation with Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.



For many refugees, the only escape from France was via the "F" Route, an ardous mountain climb into Spain.

מה לעשות עם אוסאמה

שיפרה צפרירי כותבת:

"אין טעם וריח לרעיון של להרוס את אפגניסטן-זה לא יקטין את הטרור אלא דווקא יגדיל אותו. אין גם טעם רב בתפיסת בין לאדן והריגתו, כי הוא יחפוץ לקדוש מעונה ורבים מתומכיו ירצו ללכת בעקבותיו ולהרוג יהודים האמריקנים. הפיתרון האמיתי הוא לתת לאנשי הקומאנדו לתפוס אותו, ולחביא אותו בחסתר למערב, לערוך לו ניתוח מהיר לשיניו מין, ולהחזיר אותו לפאקיסטן לחיות בתור אשה תחת שלטון הטאליבן".

" אוכלוסיית ארה"ב גדולה פי חמישים מזו של ישראל. אין זו תחרות של מי סבל יותר, אך חשבון קצר מאוד עזור לחבין את גודל האפקט של הטרור על ישראל בהשוואה לארה"ב. קרוב למאתיים יהודים נרצחו בידי טרור פלשתינאי בשנה האחרונה. הכפילו מספר זה בחמישים ותגיעו לעשרת אלפים! אנחנו עם זעיר במדינה זעירה. כמה יתומים, כמה אלמנים ואלמנות, כמה חורים שכולים נהרסו חייהם! כמה אלפי פצועים! מי יעזור להם!"

"לאור השתוללות הטרור באמריקה, כדאי להציע לממשלת ארה"ב לנקוט בצעדים הבאים שיהא עצמה הציעה לישראל:

1) לתת את כל מערב ארה"ב הברית שמעבר למיסיסיפי לאוסאמה בין לאדן.

2) להזמין אותו למו"מ לאחר שהושלמה העברת השטחים אליו.

3) להציע לאוסאמה רובים ונשק כדי שיוכל לשמור על מדינתו החדשה.

אמנים ישראלים ב- BATHURST JCC

תאכובה

Israel Bonds dinner to honor Ekstein, Schwartz

TORONTO — State of Israel Bonds will honor Anita Ekstein of Toronto and Max Schwartz of Montreal at the 17th annual International Elie Wiesel Holocaust Remembrance Award Dinner on Sunday, Nov. 11, at 5:00 p.m. at the Grand Hyatt Hotel in New York.

Ekstein and Schwartz are among the 11 Holocaust activists from Canada and the United States who will be presented with the prestigious Elie Wiesel Commemorative Medal for perpetuating Holocaust remembrance and supporting the State of Israel.

Anita Ekstein (née Helfgott) was born in Poland. She was saved from the Skole ghetto by her father, who gave her to a Polish Christian family, and survived the war under an assumed name. Both of her parents and many other family members perished.

"I am very honoured, yet humbled, for having been chosen for this tribute to represent Canada," says Ekstein

Schwartz, also Polish born, survived the Miasto Czartorisk ghetto. He hid in the surrounding forest until the Russian army liberated the area in 1944. He and his younger sister escaped the Station Czartorisk forced labour camp on the eve of its liquidation.

"Needless to say, I feel honoured. I will do aything I possibly can within my power to help the State of Israel and Israel Bonds."

Shimon Peres, foreign minister of Israel, will be the guest of honour and keynote speaker.

Since the Elie Wiesel Holocaust Remembrance Award Dinner was inaugurated in 1985, it has produced hundreds of millions of dollars in Israel Bonds investments to strengthen Israel's economy.

The dinner has also been one of Wiesel's primary forums for linking Holocaust survivors to second generation Jewry. Couvert for the dinner is $170 (US) per person. For reservations or information, call Israel Bonds at 416-789-3351 or 1-800-771-9301.

Terror attacks, anti-racism linked: journalist

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Sept. 11 attacks – the most deadly and successful acts of private terrorism in history – shattered many assumptions we have about our world, says veteran journalist and National Post columnist Robert Fulford.

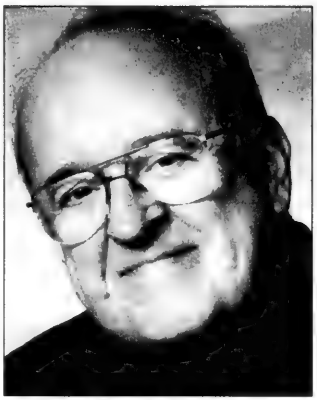
"The object that entered our soul on Sept. 11 altered us in ways the perpetrator wanted us altered," Fulford said at a recent lecture sponsored by Holy Blossom Temple.

"Our discussion of world politics has turned harsh and relentless. For some of us, Sept. 11 has aroused unwelcoming thoughts, and has led us to the uncomfortable conclusion that for years, we have spent a great deal of time denying reality," he said.

Drawing links between the attacks in New York and Washington, D.C., the West's decade-long obsession with anti-racism, and the anti-Zionist and anti-Semitic rhetoric at the recent World Conference Against Racism (WCAR) in Durban, South Africa, Fulford said we are faced with a "terrifying and unknowable future."

Fulford argued that a decade or so ago, intellectual and social history took an odd turn. "In the early '90s, something unexpected happened. There fell on all of us the plague of conformity.

"In this new atmosphere, we purchased social peace at any price. What happened to us was called political correctness – a condition that lives on the fear of giving offence," he said.



Robert Fulford

It was a movement, he said, that "knows the answer before it hears the question. It puts limits on the way we speak the impossible party line."

People all over the world were affected by this paralysis, he said, "and Durban was the possible climax to this movement. I believe that Durban brings in focus certain issues that have been ignored in past years," said Fulford.

Speaking before Fulford was Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, who attended WCAR and has described it as a global forum for promoting racism.

Fulford said Durban helped provide the setting against which the atrocities of Sept. 11 could be enacted. "No terrorist organization wants to lose popularity. The killers thought that [such events] as the intifadah, Durban, and the sanctions in Iraq gave them the opportunity for success.

"Durban became a huge success for those who made hatred of Israel a central part of their lives," he said.

Wondering why Canada was so "profusely represented" at Durban, Fulford said that "anti-racism is a favourite political theme in this country.

"We are obsessed with this above all subjects [even though] almost all countries are more racist than Canada."

Race is not like any other human concern, said Fulford, a past editor of the now-defunct Saturday Night magazine. "It has become the sin of sins. It causes us to search our souls and blame our fellow citizens. Sometimes we invent new kinds of racism. Race has become the most potent word in our culture. It paralyzes judgment and ends arguments," he said.

Fulford said he has no way to solve the current world problems. "I am here [at the lecture] because I have been trying to imagine how to think about this new historical context.

"Since Sept. 11, I have been worrying about terrorism, Islam, the Taliban, and what course America should take."

Much of our reaction to Sept. 11 "has been painfully predictable. Our commentaries have been written with detachment. We Canadians love to lecture Americans on their shortcomings because it makes us feel better."

Evil is a word that frightens us, he said. "Evil has always and will always exist... Perhaps in time, Sept. 11 will lead us to a profound understanding of evil," said Fulford.

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jewish students at Ryerson University gathered recently to celebrate Sukkot with their fellow students.

Their sukkah, located at the corner of Victoria and Gould streets, attracted more than 75 people for an affordable falafel lunch. The annual event was hosted by Ryerson's Jewish Student Association (JSA).

JSA president Jacob Moshinsky said he was very pleased with the turnout.

"The Sukkot event is one of the most successful events hosted by JSA," he said.

By hosting the party for the first time in the busiest part of the campus, the JSA (www.ryerson.ca/~jsa) is hoping to make itself more visible to Jews at Ryerson. Past president Jack Gryn said it's a matter of awareness. If Jewish students know about JSA, they are more likely to attend events.

"We'd like to see more people coming out to our events, especially now that there are two Jewish groups on campus," he said. Gryn is the current president of the Ryerson chapter of the Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi.

He estimates that there are approximately 1,000 to 1,200 Jewish students on campus at Ryerson. But with an increase in the university's general student population, he predicts that the JSA's membership will also increase.

Rabbi Shmuel Spero, who visited Ryerson from Anshei Minsk Synagogue, was impressed by the enthusiasm and spirit that he saw in the students. He believes that it is important to foster a sense of Jewish identity on campus.

"It's important that students feel at home on campus and publicly share their holiday with fellow students," Rabbi Spero said.

The sukkah also offered opportunities for education, as many people wandered by asking about it. Moshinsky, who fielded questions from curious students and faculty, was glad that the sukkah offered a chance to explain to others about the holiday.

"I feel very proud to be in a multicultural campus and I feel very proud to share a Jewish holiday with the rest of the Ryerson community" he said.

Elysse Zarek is a first-year journalism student at Ryerson University.

Hamilton boot store sends goods to New York

By JULIA KOLLEK
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Watching the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on television, Brian Miller couldn't help noticing what the rescue workers were wearing on their feet.

Many of them were not wearing safety boots and their shoes were being shredded by the metal debris at the World Trade Center site.

Miller called the New York Fire Department to see if he could help. His family store, Miller's Shoes, sold work boots and he found out his call had come just in time, as there was a shortage in the city.

"The fire department told me to contact the Salvation Army here as it was about to send blankets and gloves down to Buffalo in a shipment. If there was space and I could catch it in time, my boots could reach New York in a day or two."

Luckily, Miller was able to get 75 pairs of work boots in various sizes (worth $10,000) to the container. He sent the best kind – boots reinforced with steel plates, designed for the construction trade.

This is not the first time the Millers have helped out in a crisis. Without fanfare, the store recently gave more than 200 pairs of shoes to a local charity, and has donated to Hamilton's Jewish Social Services.

When Hurricane Gilbert hit the Caribbean, the Miller family packed up all the children's shoes in their store and sent them down.

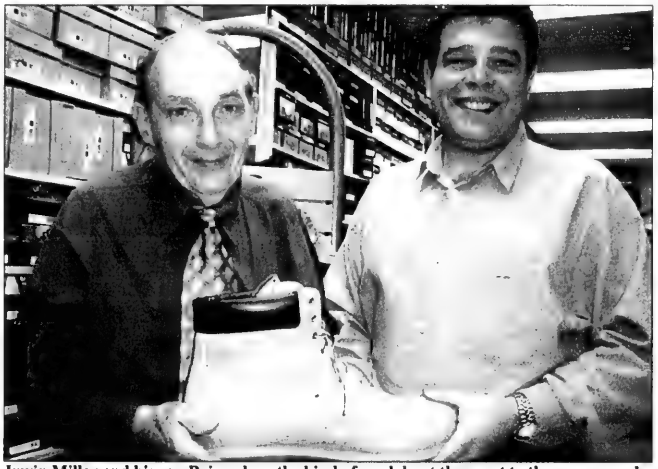
Miller is the third-generation owner of Miller's Shoes, a store that aside from work-wear, specializes in medium to high-end lines, including Italian designer labels and hard-to-find sizes.

Miller's grandfather opened the store in 1926, and it remains in the same downtown location today.

Will the New York workers need more boots?

"No, the critical point is over now and local dealers have re-stocked."

He had also heard that some U.S. boot manufacturers had sent over donations.



Irwin Miller and his son Brian show the kind of work boot they sent to the rescue workers in New York.

Minister of finance feels an autumn chill

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

No one is feeling the chill of the damp autumn weather more than the minister of finance. The dramatic shift in focus to international terrorism and the military response to the threat it poses has been accompanied by a parallel shift in ministerial space on our TV screens. The odd man out in all of this has been Paul Martin, and for him, it is an unaccustomed feeling.

All of this to say that even-money has Martin presenting a substantial budget in November – instead of the economic statement he repeatedly insisted was the extent to which he would tinker with his budget plans.

In this budget – which will likely be dubbed the "security budget" – Martin may well revert to deficit spending. This would represent another reversal for the minister, who promised never to return to those dark days of spending money the government didn't have.

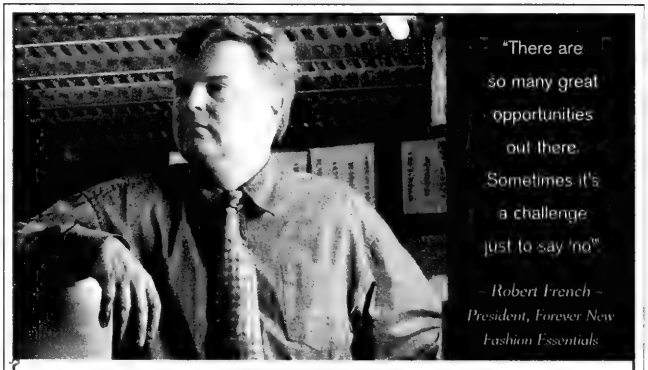
The government has been riding the economic wave for years, with booming businesses contributing huge tax revenues towards record surpluses. Now that the financial situation is much grimmer, Martin has to figure out a way to cloak the plunge in government revenue – especially in light of assured tax cuts and increased spending that allowed the Liberals to coast back into power.

The new obsession with security and continental perimeters, seamless borders and air marshals provides Martin with the camouflage he needs to bring the budget in line with the economic realities of the day. It is possible, though, that he will pine for the anonymity that was his in September after all the interest groups (from social activists on one end of the spectrum to tax revolutionaries on the other) react to what will surely be a gloomy economic forecast.

While we are on the topic of politicians who back away from commitments, we should acknowledge Marlene Catterall's backing away from what she once held to be a deeply held belief. Or so we thought. Catterall is a very decent MP from the Ottawa area who happens to be a pacifist. A decade ago, she was an awfully lonely Liberal who bucked her caucus and opposed Canadian participation in the Gulf War.

Now as government whip, she is singing a very different tune. Has she seen the light or is it simply a case of having grown too fond of the perks of office? Even if we think pacifism is terribly misdirected idealism, it would have been nice to see a politician stand up for her principles – even if it meant giving up those perks.

Autumn may have arrived, but hope springs eternal.



"There are so many great opportunities out there. Sometimes it's a challenge just to say 'no'."
– Robert French – President, Forever New Fashion Essentials

Canada keeps silent on Syrian vote

international terrorism, and is run by a "ruthless dictator" [Bashir Assad] who "appears to be even more viscerally anti-Semitic and anti-Israel than his father, and that is no mean achievement."

Indeed, Syria is one of seven countries on the U.S. State Department's list of nations accused of sponsoring terrorism, along with Sudan, Iran, Iraq, Libya, Cuba and North Korea. The United States says Syria has supported Hamas and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, among other groups.

But there was no evidence Washington opposed Syria's bid for a spot on the Security Council. In fact, even before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the administration made no move to challenge or criticize Syria's bid and kept mum on how it would vote.

As well, President George W. Bush last week reportedly resisted a last-minute appeal from 38 members of the U.S. Congress to oppose Syria's candidacy. One of the signers, Jewish Democrat Tom Lantos, said Syria's election would be an "outrage" and a "mockery" of the council's recent counter-terrorism resolutions.

Israel was the only UN member to openly oppose Syria's candidacy. It was joined by Jewish organizations from around the world.

In a statement last week, Joseph Wilder, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, said it is "a sad day when a country known as a major state sponsor of terrorism becomes a member of the principal organization that has, in the aftermath of the atrocities committed against the United States on Sept. 11, taken upon itself the responsibility of eradicating international terrorism.

"It is equally offensive that Syria should be accorded membership on the Security Council at the same time as it rejects Israeli peace overtures and when its president uses the opportunity of a historic visit by Pope John Paul II to defame not only the state of Israel but the entire Jewish faith," Wilder added.

(During the Pope's visit to Syria in May, Assad claimed Jews betrayed and tortured Jesus, and committed "treachery" against the prophet Mohammed.)

(During the Pope's visit to Syria in May, Assad claimed Jews betrayed and tortured Jesus, and committed "treachery" against the prophet Mohammed.)

Landy too found it "sad" for the UN "and the world [that] a country that supports terrorism is permitted to be on the highest decision-making committee of the UN."

But the world body has been "sullied" anyway of late, Landy said, especially by the still-bitter taste of Israel-bashing at the UN-sponsored World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa. The UN "is a body without credibility today," he said.

Yehuda Lancry, Israel's ambassador to the UN, said Syria's election went against the "spirit and letter" of the UN charter, which stipulates that every candidate for the Security Council should contribute to international peace and security.

"Syria indeed backs terrorist groups inside Syria and outside Syria," Lancry stated. "It is really a sheer absurdity and a sheer nonsense to have Syria as a member of the Security Council."

Russia, China, France, Britain and the United States hold permanent seats on the Security Council, and five non-permanent members are elected to two-year terms every year.

Like Syria, Cameroon and Guinea ran unopposed and were easily elected to the council, while Bulgaria defeated Belarus for an East European seat. It took a second ballot for Mexico to beat out the Dominican Republic for a seat representing Latin America.

was removed. Det.-Const. Brian Cowie of York Region's hate crimes unit said investigators had "skimpy" information to go on and no witnesses as to the perpetrator(s).

Cowie said police had recorded approximately 20 occurrences in which Jews or Muslims had been threatened since Sept. 11. "There certainly has been a significant jump in the number of occurrences," he said.

Since the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, officers have been told to "pay special attention to mosques and synagogues." Graffiti attacks like the ones last week have now taken on greater significance, he said.

Farber said that while the Jewish community has been advised to take extra steps to ensure security, particularly during the High Holiday period, nothing short of 24-hour, 7-day-a-week surveillance could have prevented last week's vandalism.

21ST ANNUAL HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK

featuring
SRUL IRVING GLICK

Opening Night

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 27 – 8:00 P.M.
Holy Blossom Temple
1950 Bathurst Street, Toronto

Mr. Glick is the highly acclaimed and award winning creator of Holocaust-inspired music. This evening he offers a compelling tribute to the boys of Terezin concentration camp with his latest song cycle based on the poems from their secret magazine Vedem. He will be accompanied by Cantor Benjamin Maissner, pianist Cecilia Ignatieff and cellist Stefan Glick. Special guest will be George Brady, one of the few survivors of Terezin originally involved in creating the magazine.

Join us to initiate our community's 21st annual Holocaust Education Week and to hear this remarkable piece of music.

Program is free to the public.

Food photos whet the appetite

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

There's nothing like magazine food photos to whet the appetite.

The presentation is artistic, and food is always tantalizing. Turkeys are golden brown and cooked to perfection. And dishes of ice-cream never have drips or look melted.

The food may be picture perfect for photo shoots, but a lot of it is not very edible says food stylist Ettie Benjamin Shuken.

"Ice-cream is not always ice-cream. It's Crisco, icing sugar and colouring, unless it's for an ice cream ad or commercial."

Food at room temperature is made to look hot or cold, she says. "Turkey is never cooked through. It's brushed with soap, water, oil and colouring to get it that nice golden brown."

The skin would shrivel and the bird would not be plump-looking if it were cooked completely, she explains.

Benjamin Shuken, 57, fell into food styling after completing a pre-chef program at George Brown College seven years ago.

An artist, interior decorator and former art teacher, Benjamin Shuken had been interested in food most of her adult life.

"I always loved entertaining and preparing elaborate dinners."

And the presentation was all part of the creative experience, she says. "The visual was always very important. What colour the linens were – it's all art."

The New Jersey native, a Sephardi Jew of Greek heritage, grew up with many traditional Sephardi dishes like spinach pie made with phyllo dough and vegetables in tomato sauce; dishes that are very trendy today, she says.

She says that food was an important part of family life. It was also the family business. Both her father and grandfather owned restaurants. However, Benjamin Shuken was not encouraged to pursue a career in food because of the long hours, she says. "My father thought it was donkey work — back-breaking and not creative."

But food was in her blood. In fact, her daughter Sarah, 31, also went to chef school at George Brown and is now a catering manager.

Just before she turned 50, Benjamin Shuken decided to do the chef course, she says. "My mom said, 'Do it.' I decided to follow in my daughter's footsteps."

Benjamin Shuken says she knew she was ready for chef school when she began to depict food in many of her paintings. "I was always turned on to how beautiful food was."

And chef school was a wonderful experience, she recalls. "I loved it. I had a good time with the students."

Her 20 years of design work came in handy after she graduated, she says.

When she worked at the test kitchen at Chatelaine magazine, she was encouraged to try food styling because of her design and art background, Benjamin Shuken says.

She also did recipe testing for such local cooking writers as Lucy Waverman and Rosie Schwartz.

She made a lot of contacts through the Women's Culinary Network, eventually hooking up as an assistant to a top food stylist, she says. "The food fairies [in the network] were sharing and caring and opened up doors."

She then began to make contacts and get assignments as a freelance food stylist, combining her cooking and artistic skills, she says. "It's like everything came together."

But the work required a lot of stamina because you're on your feet all day, she says. She shops and prepares much of the food ahead of time, often completing the recipe at the shoot.

"You have to understand how food handles," says Benjamin Shuken. "They'll give you the recipe and say whether it's single serving or platter; upscale or family."

She also has been teaching cooking classes in Mediterranean and Moroccan cuisine at the LCBO (Liquor Control Board of Ontario) as well as Loblaws' cooking schools.

And while she still does the odd design job, Benjamin Shuken has not had the time for painting, she says. "My last exhibition was five years ago. I hope to get back to it."

Benjamin Shuken gives classes in cooking with phyllo dough and has provided phyllo dough recipes for CJN readers.

MOROCCAN CIGARS

1 lb. phyllo dough, defrosted overnight in the refrigerator
1 medium onion, finely chopped
4 tbsp. oil
1½ lb. lean minced beef
3 tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. allspice
1 tsp. ground ginger
1½ tsp. ground cumin
1½ tsp. turmeric
pinch cayenne
¾ cup parsley, chopped
¾ cup coriander, chopped
5 eggs
salt and pepper to taste
¼ cup oil

Remove phyllo dough from refrigerator and let sit on counter for one hour to warm to room temperature. Sauté onion in 4 tbsp. oil until transparent. Add meat and stir. Add seasonings and spices and stir with a wooden spoon till meat is no longer pink, about 10 to 15 minutes.

Add parsley and coriander. Lightly beat eggs in a small bowl and pour over meat. Cook gently over medium-low heat for a minute or two until the eggs are set and creamy. Let the filling cool. Taste for seasonings.

To assemble cigars: Open phyllo dough and cover with a large sheet of foil wrap. Lightly brush with oil and stack 2 sheets of phyllo, then cut into 3 rectangles. Place a tablespoon of filling along one of the short ends. Tuck sides in so that the filling doesn't fall out, and then roll up tightly so that it looks like a cigar.

Place side by side on a greased baking tray; brush with oil and bake in a preheated 350 oven for about ½ hr. till golden brown. These may be frozen unbaked and baked from a frozen state.

SPANAKOPITA

Everyone loves spinach pie. There is no one correct recipe; some people like it with a lot of cheese, some prefer it with more spinach. Others vary the seasonings using mint or nutmeg instead of dill. Some use grated cheeses instead of feta. Just watch the salt if the cheese is too salty. Potato, farina and bread crumbs may also be added.

2 tbsp. olive oil or butter
1 small bunch green onions
2 pkgs. (10 oz. each) frozen chopped spinach, defrosted and squeezed dry.
½ cup fresh parsley chopped
½ cup fresh dill chopped
8-10 oz. ricotta cheese or pressed cottage cheese
½ lb. feta cheese crumbled
3 to 4 eggs lightly beaten
1 lb of filo dough
1 cup of butter melted cream of wheat if necessary
salt and pepper to taste

Heat oil in a large pan and sauté green onions until soft. Add spinach, parsley and dill and cook gently for five minutes. Place in a large bowl and cool.

Add cheeses, eggs salt and pepper. If filling looks too loose, add some cream of wheat as a binder.

Line 2 in. by 10 in. buttered pie pans with 6 sheets of butter phyllo. Divide the filling between the pans. Smooth tops. Cover filling with 4 sheets of buttered phyllo and roll the ends of the dough to seal the edges. Butter top. Score top with sharp knife if you wish.

Fold 1 corner of phyllo over filling so bottom edge of phyllo meets side edge to form a trianglr.

There is a right way to make phyllo dough.

Bake pies in a preheated 350 oven for 40 to 60 minutes. Spanakopita can also be made into individual small portions that are triangular in shape.

Stack filo, covering it with a large piece of foil. Use one sheet at a time and keep the rest covered. Brush phyllo with melted butter, one sheet at a time. You do not have to cover every spot with butter. Stack three layers of filo and divide into seven strips across the long side.

Place one tsp. of filling one inch from the end nearest you. Bring the bottom edge over the filling so that it meets the left edge forming a right angle. Continue folding up as you would a flag.

Butter the top and place on a baking sheet, bake at 350 20 to 25 minutes until golden brown. Can be frozen unbaked. Bake frozen on buttered cookie sheet until golden brown.

No moral relativism in the battle against international terrorism

By KEITH LANDY

It was a well-organized, well-funded and highly efficient enemy that is responsible for the worst-ever-terrorist attack on U.S. soil. The enemy has an identity, Islamic extremism, and a name, Islamism. Islamism, in contrast with Islam the religion and the historically magnificent and enduring civilization it has spawned, is a sweeping totalitarian political ideology very much akin to Nazism, fascism or bolshevism.

Islamism detests precisely the values that we in the West cherish, including our fundamental freedoms and individual liberty; structures of democratic governance; a free market economy; and the division between church and state that fosters the parallel growth of distinct spiritual and civic identities free from religious fiat and control.

It regards Christians as infidels. It abhors Judaism and reserves a special animosity for its practitioners, whom it regards as key agents in the moulding and purveying of these Western values. Its aim, in short, is to destroy Western civilization on its way to imposing its perverted understanding of Islam on the whole world.

The perpetrators of the horrific terrorist acts on September 11 chose the country and the targets within it, with the utmost deliberation.

The United States is the leading exemplar of Western values. Washington is the country's political centre, and the Pentagon its military headquarters. The country's financial heart is New York and the World Trade Center (sic) was, as it were, its financial headquarters.

Common denominator must be the condemnation, without qualification

New York is the city with the world's largest Jewish population and the Islamists, appropriating a libel from classical anti-Semitism, view the Jews as controlling world finance, and thereby world politics. The collapsing of the World Trade towers was both a tactical objective and a strategic metaphor.

Many pundits and apologists have forgotten these fundamental facts in their self-serving search for "root causes" and other putative rationalizations for what was an unmitigated act of evil. They fall back on specious moral relativism, deliberately misdirecting attention toward American economic and foreign policy and U.S. support for the State of Israel in its conflict with the Palestinians.

There have even been accusations, which can be characterized as nothing else than obscene hate propaganda, that Israel knew and did not warn of the atrocity or actually was behind it.

Those who focus on the Israeli– Palestinian conflict as a "cause" ought to remember that the war the Palestinian leadership launched against Israel one year ago and that continues to this very day, was preceded by far-reaching Israeli proposals made to the Palestinian Authority.

A negotiated and mutually acceptable agreement would have meant a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza and, or so it was hoped, the end of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Unfortunately, Yasser Arafat clearly has not been ready to make an honourable peace with Israel, and fanatics such as Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah – all terrorists with a global reach and branch plants of Islamism – demonstrate their defiance through suicide bombings only less vicious than the atrocity of September 11 in the number of dead and maimed.

Canadians were among the victims of September 11, and it appears likely that in some way or another there was a Canadian connection to this atrocity. The millennium plot to bomb the international airport in Los Angeles certainly was the work of Islamists who were Canadian residents, including Ahmed Ressam and Mokhtar Haouari, currently serving prison sentences in the United States.

Last year, the head of CSIS, in an interview, noted that of the various terrorist elements, "transnational Islamic extremism [i.e. Islamism]" currently was the "leading threat to Canada's national security." No one would dare suggest today that the situation has changed.

Canada, however, must be concerned about it being used by terrorists of many hues, as a safe haven or support base for activities around the world, including for example, the Americas, the British Isles, the Middle East and the Indian Subcontinent. It should also never forget that it is in its jurisdiction that the single worst terrorist act in aviation history was carried out – the downing of an Air India flight in 1985, with 329 mostly Canadian victims.

September 11, therefore, ought to have seared into our minds as Canadians the notion that nothing justifies terrorism. It ought to remind us as well that our country must combat it with all available resources and resoluteness and in co-operation with the United States.

We must encourage the government in its implementation of the necessary measures, and pace the do-gooders, Pollyannas or invokers of political correctness, always ensuring that sovereignty is not undermined, civil rights are not diluted, communities are not scapegoated and no individuals or organizations are victimized by contemptible acts of bigotry.

In short, anti-terrorism measures that, as mandated by the Charter, "can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society."

In the aftermath of the disasters, momentum gathered in Western states to promote social harmony and cohesion, a sense of pulling together in the face of an enemy that threatens us all, our shared values and way of life.

If this co-operation is going to be in any way meaningful, its common denominator must be the condemnation, without qualification, of international terrorism, everywhere and in all its forms, including suicide bombings. This is the only path to standing genuinely together arm in arm.

IDF to exit PA areas in Hebron

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — IDF forces withdrew early Monday morning from Palestinian-controlled areas of Hebron that they had occupied 10 days earlier.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told the weekly cabinet meeting Sunday that the inner security cabinet had decided to ease restrictions on the Palestinians, and that the IDF would withdraw from the Abu Sneina and Harat a Sheik neighborhoods in Hebron.

Sharon said an understanding had been reached with the Palestinian Authority that once the IDF has withdrawn, the Palestinian security forces will work to ensure that shooting on the Jewish enclave below does not resume.

Israel Radio reported Sunday that at a meeting late last week, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres told senior Palestinian officials Abu Ala and Saeb Erekat that Israel would lift the closure on Jericho and open border crossings at Rafah in the Gaza Strip and at the Allenby Bridge in the West Bank, for longer periods of time. Roadblocks in the Ramallah area will be opened, as well as the main road in Rafah, easing restrictions that have been in place on Palestinian travel.

In a heated exchange, the cabinet debated proposals to implement a number of measures to ease conditions for Palestinians in the territories. The steps, taken in response to the relative drop in violence in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, will make it easier for Palestinians to move around within the territories.

In the wake of the announcement by Sharon, Tourism Minister Rehavam Ze'evi and National Infrastructure Minister Avigdor Lieberman, leaders of the National Union-Yisrael Beiteinu bloc, announced their resignations from the cabinet. Public Security Minister Uzi Landau of Likud had scheduled a news conference for Monday afternoon. Sources within the Likud said he might also announce his resignation.

Ze'evi and Lieberman cited the pullback as the trigger for their departure, but pointed out that the recently disclosed administration peace talks initiative of George W. Bush was the real target of their opposition. The two are the first ministers to leave Sharon's unity government.

"The Palestinians are still firing mortar shells," Ze'evi said. "Arafat has reduced the volume a little in order to win legitimacy in Washington."

Meanwhile, IDF security officials confirmed that Israel was responsible for the killing of a senior member of the Hamas military wing, who was shot to death Sunday morning at the entrance to his home in the Qalqilya area.

According to Israeli security sources, the Hamas member was involved in the planning of the suicide bomb attack at the Dolphinarium disco in Tel Aviv on June 1, in which 22 people, most of them teenagers, were killed. He was arrested by the Palestinian Authority in June, but was released in August and resumed his activities against Israel.

On Monday, another Hamas operative wanted by Israel, Ahmed Marshoud, was killed. Some Palestinians said he was killed in a helicopter missile strike, while others said a booby-trapped car exploded as he walked past. The Israeli army declined to comment.

Blair, Arafat to meet

Last week U.S. President George W. Bush gave his strongest support yet to the creation of a Palestinian state if it left Israel in peace.

Prior to the meeting, Blair was expected to tell Arafat that London is backing the U.S. peace initiative and that it plans to recognize a Palestinian state if the PA fulfills its commitment to fight terror and prevent attacks against Israel. Arafat's invitation to London was co-ordinated with the United States, which is trying to advance an initiative to renew talks between Israel and the PA.

According to PA Information Minister Yasser Abed Rabbo, Arafat wouldn't be satisfied with general statements and would be seeking a more detailed statement from Blair. Over the past few days, Rabbo has led efforts by Palestinian officials to play down the significance of the recent statements by Bush with regard to a Palestinian state.

The initiative, as far as is known, refers to the borders of the state being defined "through negotiations," but according to Rabbo, these borders were already determined at the Madrid Conference after the Gulf War and are the 1967 pre-Six-Day war lines.

Renowned scholar Rabbi Ahron Soloveichik dead at 84

By PAULINE DUBKIN YEARWOOD
Chicago Jewish News

Obituary

CHICAGO — When Ella Shurin Soloveichik, the wife of renowned Torah scholar Rabbi Ahron Soloveichik, died two months ago, he told other family members that he felt as if half his soul had left him.

So it was not entirely surprising that, after overcoming a debilitating stroke 18 years ago and continuing in his life's work, teaching Torah, up until the very end, Rabbi Soloveichik himself died Oct. 4 after suffering a heart attack. He was 84.

Rabbi Soloveichik, the descendant of one of Europe's leading rabbinic dynasties, was the founder and head of Yeshivas Brisk in Chicago and one of the world's foremost Talmudic scholars and authorities on Jewish law. He taught Torah for 58 years, the last 34 in Chicago.

Aside from his awe-inspiring scholarship, he was known for being a humble, kind man, yet one with an iron will: although the stroke he suffered in 1983 left him partially paralyzed and in a wheelchair, he continued his duties as rosh yeshiva of Yeshivas Brisk and flew to New York every week to teach a Talmud class at Yeshiva University.

Rabbi Soloveichik was born in Khaslavichy in western Russia in 1918 into a rabbinic dynasty going back nine generations. His father, Moshe, was the chief rabbi of his town and a renowned scholar; his older brother, Rabbi Joseph Ber Soloveichik, known simply as the Rav and considered the 20th century's leading rabbinic scholar, headed Yeshiva University in New York. Ahron Soloveichik's early teaching came from such Torah giants as the Chofetz Chaim, the Imrei Emmes and Rabbi Yitzhak Hutner.

The Soloveichik family moved first to Poland, then, in 1930, to the U.S. Young Ahron Soloveichik graduated from Yeshiva College and received his rabbinic ordination but found that he was having a hard time getting a job in New York. So he went to New York University Law School and graduated with a law degree in 1946. He spent the next 20 years teaching at yeshivot in New York.

In 1966, he came to Chicago to head the Hebrew Theological College in Skokie, a post he held until 1974, when he left to start Yeshivas Brisk.

Rabbi Soloveichik wrote two books in English, Logic of the Heart, Logic of the Mind and The Warmth and the Light, as well as numerous Hebrew volumes.

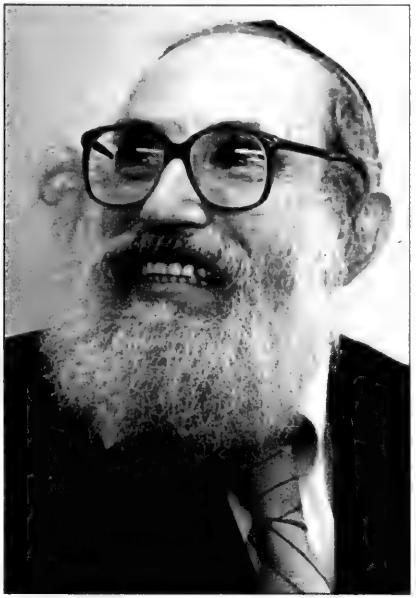
It was as an interpreter of Jewish law that Rabbi Soloveichik gained his greatest fame. His scholarship was incredible, said Rabbi Daniel Moscowitz, director of Lubavitch-Chabad of Illinois.

"He was able to take his vast Torah knowledge and apply it to modern-day questions. He was also a leader – someone who was not afraid to take stands on issues and to make his stands known to the public."

Indeed, those stands – always firmly rooted in Torah knowledge – were sometimes controversial. He was the only Orthodox rabbi in the country to oppose the Vietnam War, maintaining that fighting to save the world from Communism was a fallacious goal.

He also differed from many of his peers in ruling that, based on Torah, brain death was not sufficient to certify that a person is dead.

An outspoken opponent of the Oslo peace process, he advocated on behalf of the settlements in the West Bank and Gaza, urging Israel to not compromise their security. As well, he made it clear that he did not trust the peace pledges of Palestinian Authority chairman Yasser Arafat. He was also one of the few Orthodox rabbis in the world who blamed some in the Orthodox community for creating a climate of incitement that led to the assassination of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.



Rabbi Ahron Soloveichik

But it may have been as a teacher that Rabbi Soloveichik had his greatest influence. One of his former students, Rabbi Ephraim Kletenik, called him a master teacher who not only taught Torah to his students but also inspired them and was a role model, the guiding force in their lives. Rabbi Kletenik, who studied with Rabbi Soloveichik for seven years and has known him for more than 35, is a rebbe and general studies principal at Yeshiva Tiferes Tzvi, a Chicago boys' elementary school.

'Everything he did, he really did with passion'

Rabbi Avrohom Levine, the head of Telshe Yeshiva in Chicago, called Rabbi Soloveichik, whom he considered his best friend, a source of inspiration for all the rosh yeshivot and rabbis in the Chicago community.

"He inspired us all with his dedication to studying and teaching, even in extremely difficult circumstances," Rabbi Levine said.

Rabbi Asher Lopatin, spiritual leader of Anshe Sholom Bnai Israel Congregation in Chicago, knew and studied with Rabbi Soloveichik from the time Rabbi Lopatin was in high school. The younger man remained close to his teacher, and would consult him on a weekly basis on various matters of Jewish law and interpretation.

He said that one of Rabbi Soloveichik's greatest strengths was that he was able to come up with rulings that were firmly rooted in Jewish law but that worked for the modern world.

"It wasn't that he was pandering; he never pandered or compromised," Rabbi Lopatin said. "It's just that from the deepest place, he had a sensitivity for living in a complex world."

Rabbi Soloveichik, he said, was a visionary whose rulings were far ahead of his time. For instance, he was ruling on matters concerning stem cells nearly a decade ago.

"His practical skills, for me, were as brilliant as his theoretical learning," Rabbi Lopatin said. "He had a feel, an intuition for this world. It was an amazing experience to be around him, to hear him give rulings. He always gave them with such passion. Everything he did, he really did with passion."

Rabbi Raphael Marcus, spiritual leader of Toronto's B'Nai Torah Congregation, was Rabbi Soloveichik's son-in-law. He told The CJN that every Sukkot for the past 13 years, Rabbi Soloveichik came to Toronto to visit his family here, to give public lectures, and to meet with local rabbinic leadership.

Anyone who attended those lectures will remember the intense impact of his presence, in spite of the frailty of his physical being.

Rabbi Marcus added that "Although he was recognized throughout the Jewish world as one of this generation's gedolei hador, one of the greatest Jewish scholars and halachic authorities, the bond of love and the time he spent with his children never suffered or was sacrificed to the incredible demands placed on him by the wider Jewish community."

Rabbi Soloveichik is survived by six children. His four sons, all rabbis, are Moshe and Eliyahu of Chicago and Yosef and Chaim of Israel. His daughter, Rochel Marcus, is married to Rabbi Marcus in Toronto, and his other daughter, Tova Seigal, of Newton, Mass., is also married to a rabbi. He is also survived by two sisters in Jerusalem, almost 40 grandchildren and seven great-grandchildren. He was buried on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem.

The Week in Israel

Oct. 8

• A 17-year-old Palestinian who killed himself and an Israeli yesterday was the 100th suicide bomber to attack Israel since 1993. According to Ha'aretz, 66 of the bombers were recruited by Hamas; 34 by Islamic Jihad; 77 had either a university or high school education; and 67 were 23 years old or younger.

• Israeli Arab legislators condemned the U.S.-led attack on Afghanistan. They said they could not give their backing to the campaign because it would lead to civilian casualties, a stance similar to that of Iran.

Oct. 9

• A group of Jewish investors from Israel and abroad is set to sign a deal to purchase 18 dunams of land near the Sheikh Jarah neighborhood, close to the Green Line in East Jerusalem. The move will ensure Jewish control over the area around the nearby Shimon Hatzadik neighbourhood.

The investors were assembled by the Homot Shalem association, which is closely aligned with MK Benny Elon.

Oct. 10

• Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein ordered police to investigate Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for allegedly violating an election funding law by accepting a donation of about $1.4 million (U.S.) to fund a primary election campaign in 1999.

Oct. 11

• The government declared a national day of mourning for the victims of the Air Sibir crash over the Black Sea in which 78 people died, 51 of them Russian-born Israelis.

Oct. 12

• According to media reports, senior IDF officials said they have "no doubt" of Washington's desire to strike at Iraq at a later date.

NATIONAL DAY OF MOURNING:
The government of Israel declared Oct. 11 a day of mourning for the victims of the Air Sibir disaster earlier in the month. All 78 persons aboard the plane were killed, including 66 Israelis when the plane fell out of the sky. On the weekend, the government of Ukraine admitted that one of its army's missiles accidently brought the plane down. [Israel photo]

It is vital we destroy the myth

According to Reports

"America is paying for the crimes of Israel. Discuss."

Thus began a three-page examination in the Oct. 6 issue of the influential Economist of the U.S.-Israel relationship in light of the Sept. 11 attacks. Fortunately, the Economist, often harshly critical of Israel, attempted to put this often repeated myth to rest in quick fashion:

"The crude version of this argument – if Israel did not make Arabs angry, the attack might not have happened – can be swiftly disposed of. In Osama bin Laden's 1998 fatwa against America, Israel ranks last – after America's 'occupation' of Saudi Arabia during the Gulf war and its continuing attacks on Iraq – among the three causes he gives for his war against America."

The Economist, however, may be overly sanguine. Just because this myth "can be swiftly disposed of" doesn't mean that it will be. There are, after all, many individuals and groups determined to blame Israel as a way of diverting attention from their own failures.

Nevertheless, efforts abound by several journalists to shatter the myth. Previous columns have drawn attention to some of them, including last week's in which I drew readers' attention to the statement by Christopher Hitchens that, whatever one thinks of this or that Israeli policy, only a "moral cretin" would argue that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict caused Bin Laden's group to unleash their horrendous attacks on the U.S.

Similar rejoinders to the myth are to be found in the commentary pages of the National Post, Southam newspapers across the country, and in the Globe and Mail.

For instance, in a superb in-depth analysis of the context and meaning of the Sept. 11 attacks ("From delusions to destruction," National Post, Oct. 6), Robert Fulford argued that those who maintain that a solution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is a "necessary step on the road to ending terrorism" have evidently forgotten "that the Barak government offered a settlement that contained just about everything the Palestinian leadership had asked for, and was turned down..." The reasoning that places the onus on Israel, Fulford continued, "has made it difficult to come to an honest understanding of what happened on Sept. 11."

As others have pointed out, bin Laden's group, like Hamas and Islamic Jihad, do not want to see Israeli-Palestinian reconciliation (inherently a vital necessity for the well-being of both peoples); rather, they want to see Israel destroyed, to be replaced by an Islamic theocracy. That same intolerance and hatred towards Israel extends to Jews worldwide. Such is the twisted agenda of those who are bent on what writer/historian Michael Ignatieff has very appropriately called "a kind of apocalyptic fanaticism."

Cellist at loggerheads with Toronto Symphony

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sitting with Daniel Domb recently, it was hard to believe he could be at the centre of any controversy.

Surrounded by photos of his children, the soft-spoken cellist reminisced about his upbringing in Israel and the musical path which led him to the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO).

For 27 years, Domb has been the TSO's principal cellist. A recent lawsuit, however, has put him at loggerheads with the symphony.

Last month, Domb's lawyer, Louis Sokolov, filed a statement of claim against the TSO and Edward Smith, departing executive director of the symphony, alleging that over the past year the cellist has been discredited and defamed. The TSO has not yet filed its defence.

The dispute began after a near fatal accident in Mexico in which Domb suffered serious head injuries. During the time that the cellist was on leave from the symphony, he performed with an amateur orchestra and was subsequently fired from the TSO.

Domb claims he had received permission from the TSO to appear in the amateur concert. That performance, Domb alleges, represented a trial run for the cellist since the venue and musical performance were far less onerous than a concert with the Toronto symphony.

Although Domb was later reinstated to his position, his future with the TSO is currently far from clear.

Reflecting on the origins of his musical career, Domb recalled his early years studying the violin with his mother in Haifa.

"Although I began on violin, I always wanted to play cello," Domb said.

At that time, the Israel Philharmonic used to come to Haifa every few weeks to perform and Domb and his family were always present as part of a devoted audience.

"One day, [French cellist] Paul Tortelier performed as a guest with the Israel Philharmonic," Domb recalled. Tortelier fell in love with Israel and remained on Kibbutz Ma'abarot for over a year.

Domb began cello lessons at the kibbutz and at the age of 14 followed his teacher to Paris. The young cellist went on to study with Leonard Rose at the Julliard School of Music.

He was chosen by Leonard Bernstein to play with the New York Philharmonic and performed with the American Symphony Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski. After a two-year stint as acting principal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra, Domb moved to Canada to become TSO's principal cellist.

Domb's attachment to his roots is evident in the Israeli songs which appear on his CDs and in his performances. For years, Domb has played Kol Nidre at Holy Blossom, as well as participated in other community events.

He recently performed with his wife, Carey, who plays cello and guitar, at a benefit concert to honour the victims and families of the Sept. 11 terrorist attack.

The duo has performed in senior's residences, schools and prisons. They have released three CDs together.

Carey, who studied music at Rice University in Texas, said that at this point in their lives they have had to imagine life without the TSO.

"After the shock of leaving the symphony wore off, we started to re-evaluate," she said.

"We realized that we really enjoy playing smaller concerts. When we play smaller recitals, they're intimate – in an old school house, or in somebody's home.

"It becomes very meaningful when you can feel an interaction and a closeness with the audience which you don't feel when you're playing a large venue.

"We feel that we're able to impart happiness because we're able to share the music we love so much," she said.

"We include a lot of Jewish and Israeli songs in our repertoire," Domb added.

"One of my favourite pieces is Schelomo by Ernst Bloch, one of the greatest Jewish composers," he said. "It is a piece for cello with orchestra. When I was with the Cleveland Orchestra, I played it about five or six times in two years."

Faith played a major role for Dutch Righteous Gentiles

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's not often that Holocaust documentaries set their sights on the Netherlands, home to a prewar Jewish population of just 140,000, 30,000 of whom were German and Austrian refugees. Why does Hidden Heroes (to air on VisionTV Oct. 24 at 10 p.m. and Oct. 30 at 10 p.m.) focus on how Dutch Jews fared under Nazi occupation and on the motivations of their Gentile rescuers?

The only answer is, "Why not?" For it's as good a place as any to explore what compelled seemingly ordinary people to risk their lives in order to shelter their neighbours from evil.

The film, narrated by Canadian actor Sonja Smits, whose grandfather was a leader in the Dutch Resistance, also pays tribute to one of the stronger undergrounds in Nazi-occupied Europe. Its efficacy, though, was at a dear cost: Some 28,000 Resistance fighters from Holland perished at German hands.

Hidden Heroes follows the stories of several Dutch Jews, two of them Canadian, who, still as children, were hidden during the war in all kinds of improbable places: cellars, closets, chicken coops, even a hollowed out stack of peat. Their rescuers, we are told, were motivated generally by the same principles that drove other Righteous Gentiles: faith, politics and moral outrage.

In the case of Holland, though, it appeared the major factor was faith, with the country's robust Christian Reformed church putting its selfless principles into action. Indeed, the leader of the Dutch Resistance, Frits Slomp, was a pastor driven by convictions drawn from the Bible.

The Nazis rolled into Holland in May, 1940 and the country fell barely five days later. Jews were forced to register with the regime and by 1942, were wearing the yellow star. It was in that terror-filled atmosphere that Ada Wynston, now of Toronto, recalls her mother being yanked off a streetcar by the Gestapo, never to be seen again, while the young girl concealed her cloth Star of David with her cardigan. Still plainly guilt-ridden, Wynston today wonders, "Why I didn't follow is what followed me for 50 years afterwards."

Wynston, then just six, was among hundreds of Jewish children picked up by the Nazis and imprisoned at a day care centre in Amsterdam, where they awaited transport to the Westerbork transit camp, a way station to Auschwitz. The Resistance rescued 232 of the children, including Wynston and her little sister Betty, and transported them to safe houses all over Holland.

The sisters and two dozen others were taken to a home in southern Holland, where the family already had 10 children of their own. Ada peeled potatoes while Betty was transferred to a childless couple, where she was raised "like a baby in a warm nest." Those years, she reveals, were the most wonderful of her life, and she longed to return to her "war mother" even after being reunited with her natural father following liberation. Today, Betty cares for her elderly saviour.

In all, the sisters lost 73 relatives.

At the Drenth home, 13 Jews and a German deserter were hidden under one roof for three years. To avoid suspicion, the Drenths' 16-year-old daughter, Lammie, was sent to work for the local Nazi administration. She helped save lives with advanced knowledge of raids she was able to learn at work.

After several narrow escapes, Vera Yehros, also now of Toronto, found shelter with a religious Christian family as a mother's helper. "They believed God had sent me," she remembers. She became one of the clan, attending family functions and church, where the young girl learned to love the sound of the organ. Yehros lost all her close relatives in the Holocaust.

Interviews include the calm recollections of one-time armed Resistance fighter Truus Menger, who, as a teenaged girl, shot and killed a Nazi who had murdered a baby by slamming it into a wall. Menger's sole regret is not having saved more children.

Holland was liberated by Canadians and other Allies in May, 1945. Just 40,000 Dutch Jews survived the war, thousands more than if the Christian rescuers had turned their backs.

The only quibble that can be raised with Hidden Heroes is that it's disjointed. Interviews seem confusingly out of sequence and anecdotes are presented piecemeal. But what the movie exceeds at is imparting the best of human nature – at a time we need it most.

Mikveh puts a woman's touch to klezmer music

By ERIC STEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Klezmer and Yiddish music continues to evolve in a number of new directions. One of the latest permutations of this continuing trend is the advent of the "supergroup" Mikveh.

Featuring all-stars of the New York klezmer and Yiddish scene, Mikveh heralds the arrival of what is sure to be a more prominent subgenre in klezmer music: the all-woman klezmer band.

Historically, klezmer music has been a man's world. Mostly, it is only since the klezmer revival began in the mid-'70s that women have become involved as performers of the music. But while women have now taken their place as equals in groups alongside male klezmorim, little within the interpretive aspects of the tradition has been altered by the influx of the fairer sex. That is, until now.

Mikveh will be appearing at University of Toronto's Convocation Hall on October 20 in a concert presented by Friends of Yiddish in association with the U of T. Yiddish Studies program.

Fronted by Adrienne Cooper, regarded by many as the top female practitioner of Yiddish vocal music, the group also features violinist extraordinaire Alicia Svigals of the Klezmatics, accordionist Lauren Brody, formerly of the pioneering revival group Kapelye, clarinetist/saxophonist Margot Leverett, protege of klezmer clarinet legend Sid Beckerman, and bassist Nicki Parrot, a seasoned jazz veteran but a relative newcomer to klezmer.

Their demographics are enough to justify a recent reviewers' assessment that "there's never been anything like this." But what is truly unique about this assemblage is that they approach Jewish music, in Cooper's words, "through the prism of women's lives."

Their new self-titled CD explores themes particular to the female Jewish experience. From songs about miscarriage and spousal abuse to celebrations of fertility cycles and women's work, the music is pitched from a decidedly female perspective.

Yiddish vocals and klezmer rhythms figure prominently, but the group doesn't simply rehash standards. They sing of contemporary concerns, in English and Yiddish, and combine both traditional and modern musical esthetics.

The group has unearthed some rarely-heard gems and developed new compositions, some of which come from or pay homage to other women of the klezmer/Yiddish tradition, including New York Yiddish poet/song-writer Beyle Schaechter-Gottesman, Philadelphia klezmer drummer Elaine Hoffman-Watts, and the late Bronya Sakina, a Soviet emigre who introduced a number of "new" songs into the contemporary Yiddish scene.

Mikveh is not necessarily a "feminist" group. Avoiding heavy-handedness, the group's feminine perspective comes through in celebration rather than confrontation.

As Cooper insists, it is "not just about us being women. It's just mature music, not at all doctrinaire, just human."

Indeed, the maturity and humanity of Mikveh's music is evident on a number of wonderful tracks on their CD. Of particular note are: Yosemame/Orphan Mama, an incredibly moving original lyric about the quiet grief of miscarriage; Sorele's Bas-Mitsveh, an exciting celebration of a mother's pride and joy as her daughter passes into adulthood; and an intensely rapturous take on the well-known Vus Vet Zayn.

The performances on Mikveh's CD are top-notch. Leverett's elegant and understated playing stands out, particularly on a beautiful Gasn Nign, and Cooper's powerful vocals, delivered with passion and meaning, are absolutely stunning.

Unfortunately, she turns over lead vocal duties to Brody on a few tracks and these tend to fall below the standard set throughout the rest of the CD. Brody's voice, while not without its charm, is thinner and folkier than Cooper's – at times it borders on shrill. On a recording where the peerless Cooper figures so prominently, Brody's vocals on otherwise excellent tracks like Heart of the World, and Borsht tend to disrupt the high standard set throughout the rest of the CD.

Brody does make an excellent contribution on backing vocals and on accordion.

An extra treat in store for Toronto audiences is the addition to the group of Philadelphia trumpeter Susan Sandler. A fourth-generation descendant of the great "Hoffman" klezmer dynasty, Sandler is an absolutely amazing musician and a delightful iconoclast within the often staid world of Jewish music. She also possesses a beautiful singing voice, which, if we are lucky, will be showcased during Mikveh's performance.

Mikveh's fresh and vital music, derived from and fixed firmly within evolving Jewish musical traditions, deserves a broad audience. Mikveh's CD can be ordered from www.yiddishmusicians.com. Tickets for this week's concert are available at Israel's (897 Eglinton West), the Bloor JCC (750 Spadina), or by phone 416-635-2883 ext.155.

INTERNATIONAL FESTIVAL OF AUTHORS AT HARBOURFRONT

There are so many talented writers in Israel that it is a pleasure to report that, after a lapse of several years, one of them is scheduled to read at Toronto's annual International Festival of Authors, which runs Oct. 17 to 27 at Harbourfront.

Etgar Keter is regarded as one of Israel's hippest young writers and is apparently hugely popular with the younger generation. He is foremost a writer of short stories. His latest collection is The Bus Driver Who Wanted to Be God & Other Stories.

Many of his stories have been made into small films. As a screenwriter, he won the Israeli equivalent of an Oscar for his movie Skin Deep.

By appearing at the Festival, Keter is in very good literary company that includes:

• Renata Adler, long-time staff writer at The New Yorker and author of Canaries in the Mineshaft, a new collection of essays;

• Margaret Atwood, whose latest novel, The Blind Assassin, won the Booker Prize;

• British author A.S. Byatt, who won a Booker for her novel Possession (1990) and deserved another for the brilliant Angels and Insects;

• South African writer J.M. Coetzee, a two-time Booker winner, most recently for Disgrace (1999);

• Timothy Findley, whose latest novel, Spadework, is set at Ontario's Stratford festival;

•Nancy Huston, Canadian-born writer living in Paris whose novel The Mark of the Angel won the Canadian Jewish Book Award for fiction last year;

*__Hal Niedzvicki__, an accomplished local writer, editor and musician.

As this brief list demonstrates, the Festival offers an embarrassment of literary riches. For further details on these and many other authors, visit the website www.readings.org. Tickets, 416-973-4000.

Literary Events at Israel's: Judy Kopelow is the producer-director of Ani Maamin, a cantata by Elie Wiesel and music by Darius Milhaud, set for performance in November as part of Holocaust Education Week. The first in Israel's fall series of speakers, Kopelow discusses the work on Sunday Oct. 21, 7:30 p.m.

Ibolya Grossman, author of An Ordinary Woman in Extraordinary Times, tells her story of survival in the Budapest Ghetto in wartime Hungary. Oct 31, 7:30 p.m.

Sara Horowitz, author of Voicing the Void: Muteness and Memory in Holocaust Fiction, discusses works by Elie Wiesel, Primo Levi, Ida Fink and others. Horowitz is the associate director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies. Nov. 1, 7:30 p.m.

Frank Bialystok, author of Delayed Impact, discusses the collective memory of the postwar Canadian Jewish community. The book won the Tannenbaum award for Canadian Jewish history. Nov. 6, 7:30 p.m.

Grossman, Horowitz and Bialystok appear as part of Holocaust Education Week. Israel's Judaica, 897 Eglinton Ave. W. (west of Bathurst). Admission free; refreshments. 416-256-1010.

New Book by Paikin: Politics can be as addictive as gambling, according to Toronto-based telejournalist Steve Paikin. In a new book, The Life: The Seductive Call of Politics, he takes an introspective look at what keeps our politicians coming back for more.

Former Ontario Premier William Davis is scheduled to give remarks at the book launch. Oct. 24, 5 to 7 p.m. University of Toronto, Massey College, 4 Devonshire Place. www.stevepaikin.com

Golani on Tour: Master violist Rivka Golani performs two concerts in the Toronto area as part of a national tour. She performs with a piano at the Thornhill Presbyterian Church, 271 Centre St. on Oct. 26, 8 p.m. and gives another recital at the Leaside Presbyterian Church, 670 Eglinton Ave. E., Oct. 28, 7 p.m.

Gelber Prize: Lord Robert Skidelsky, the British author of John Maynard Keynes, Fighting for Britain 1937-1946, is the winner of the $50,000 Lionel Gelber prize for outstanding nonfiction in international affairs.

The book, the third and final volume by Skidelsky on Keynes, is "a brilliant and breathtaking account of the life and work of the economist whose theories so influenced the 20th century," said jury chair Patrick Martin.

The winner was announced in September by Nance J. Gelber, chair of the prize board, and Janice Gross Stein, director of the Munk Centre for International Studies at the University of Toronto. The awards ceremony, originally planned for Sept. 25, was postponed until later this year because of the tragic events in New York and Washington.

Isaac Stern immortalized on video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

One of the most respected men of our time, Isaac Stern, recently passed away.

Although he was one of the most accomplished violinists and musicians of his age, Stern was also one of the great humanitarians of the 20th century. He supported and assisted many young musicians. He led the fight to preserve Carnegie Hall in New York City. And he was devoted to Israel. And many of his passions and causes are immortalized on video.

In the spring of 1967, during the build up before the Six Days War, Stern cancelled all of his concerts and other obligations and flew to Israel. A few days after the war, Stern joined Leonard Bernstein and the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra in a memorable concert on Mt. Scopus, which concert is available on video under the title: A Journey to Jerusalem.

Stern was always eager to extend his reach. As a result, he provided the violin music for the 1946 film, Humoresque, starring John Garfield and Joan Crawford. And when it came time to record the emotional violin solos for the soundtrack of Fiddler on the Roof, it seemed appropriate that Norman Jewison asked Stern to provide the music.

Isaac Stern

Stern's last major film appearance was in the Meryl Streep film, Music of the Heart, that tells the true story of a music teacher who tries to teach a group of Harlem children to play the violin. At one point, Streep arranges a concert at Carnegie Hall and is helped to make this a reality by Stern. Sony Classics has also released a biographical video about Stern's life called Isaac Stern–A Life.

So while Isaac Stern may no longer be with us, his memory and his music will live on forever in the recordings and films he made.

Explore the historical and natural wonders of southwestern Turkey

By HENRY SREBRNIK
Special to The CJN

MARMARIS, Turkey — Since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, people are, quite understandably, wary of airplane travel, in particular to the Middle East. Yet there is one country that has remained untouched by the ideological and political fanaticism swirling around the region – Turkey.

This is a country that combines the warmth, sun and beaches of seaside resorts, the breathtaking natural wonders, majestic mountain ranges and sweet-scented pine forests of its rugged countryside, and the awe-inspiring cultural and historical remains of ancient cities where Alexander the Great and the apostle Paul, among others, once walked.

Go, in particular, to Marmaris, Ephesus, Pamukkale and the Anatolian high country that connects them. It's like having southern California, Colorado and the marvels of old Greece and Rome rolled into one, and all within a few hundred kilometres of each other.

The lovely town of Marmaris sits on a beautiful peninsula surrounded by pine-clad mountains on all sides, where the Aegean meets the Mediterranean. The splendid harbour is home to Turkey's biggest yacht marina, and the seaside promenade is lined with wonderful shops and restaurants. The beaches are clean and well cared for.

At night, Marmaris grows even more magical as you wander through the little alleyways of the old town and sip Turkish coffee in one of the many little cafes.

Visit the covered bazaar, which shelters a good part of the old town from the sun, and teems with small shops selling all manner of handicrafts, carpets, jewelry and souvenirs (including the ubiquitous nazar boncugu, the blue-and-white amulet designed to ward off the "evil eye," which comes in all shapes and sizes).

Marmaris Castle, which sits atop a steep hill in the oldest part of the town, looks like something out of a Disney cartoon; it must have been the template for many an illustrated fairy tale. Its origins date back to 3000 BCE and it has guarded the city's trade routes to Rhodes, Egypt and other Mediterranean kingdoms.

Alexander conquered the castle when he occupied Marmaris in 334 BCE. It was restored again, some 19 centuries later, by the Ottoman sultan Suleyman the Magnificent.

The castle can be reached by walking up steep, narrow streets from the harbour below. The entrance opens into a garden, and steps on either side lead up to the ramparts. The seven covered areas and rooms within the castle have been turned into an archeological museum, exhibiting oil lamps, clay pots, copper utensils, coins, weapons and figurines, dating from the Hellenic, Roman, Byzantine and Ottoman periods.

Ephesus (Efes in Turkish), 205 kilometres northwest of Marmaris, is an incredible place, even for those who are not Christians. The apostles Paul and John lived here in the first century CE.

Ephesus was founded in the 10th century BCE by the Ionians, grew into a major metropolis in Greek and Roman times, and during its Golden Age in the early Christian era, its population may have reached 300,000. It became the most important city in Asia Minor and one of the principal ports and trading centres in the Mediterranean.

Even today, the immensity of the ruins that remain takes your breath away; they are as large in area as a fair-sized town. Along the streets of Ephesus, the visitor walks past monumental fountains, temples to Greek gods and goddesses such as Artemis (or Diana), Isis, Nike and Venus, and to Roman emperors like Hadrian and Trajan. The agora or market place, the spectacular ruins of the great library of Celcus and the huge amphitheatre that seats 25,000 spectators make this an unforgettable experience.

The Christian missionary Paul came to Ephesus twice between 49 and 53 CE, during his second and third missionary journeys, and lived in the city for some 2½ years.

We travelled on to Pamukkale, 225 kilometres to the west of Ephesus, and site of an extraordinary natural wonder. Hot (35 degrees celsius) calcium-laden thermal spring waters rise in the mountains nearby and tumble down the steep hillsides, creating a myriad of pools surrounded by white stalactites. From a distance these terraces look like ice castles (the Turks think of them as cotton castles). Visitors can splash in the hot waters, reputed to heal various ailments of mind and body.

The remains of another ancient Roman city, Hierapolis, founded in 190 BCE, are nearby. It has an antique theatre, a temple dedicated to Apollo, colonnaded streets, arches and memorial gates leading to a necropolis or burial site stretching for more than two kilometres. You can even swim in a "sacred pool" with the remains of Roman marble columns and slabs at its bottom!

You'll feel like a millionaire when you visit Turkey, since one Canadian dollar buys about 745,000 Turkish lira!

Seriously, though, your money does go a long way in Turkey. The country has experienced a severe financial crisis – the rate of inflation this year will run above 50 percent – and the lira has lost some 40 percent of its value against the dollar since February. So an excellent meal can be had for under $15, and a very decent hotel room costs less than $50 a night.

The easiest way to see this part of Turkey is to fly from Istanbul (itself, of course, a world-class attraction) to the international airport at Dalaman on the Mediterranean. From there, it's a 90-minute hop by airport bus through lovely countryside to Marmaris. Guided tours in comfortable and spacious air-conditioned coaches, leave Marmaris for Ephesus and Pamukkale daily; a two-day trip, including all meals, an overnight stay in a three-star hotel and entrance fees to all sites, will run about $100 per person – excellent value for the money, as we found out. (From Marmaris, you can also visit the enchanting Greek island of Rhodes, a short one-hour ferry ride away.)

It's best to come in spring (May-June) or fall (September-October); the days are not too hot and it almost never rains, but the sea is perfect for swimming and water sports.

First cognitive therapy centre opens in Israel

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A former Montrealer has said Israel is the "perfect lab" for treating Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) and other anxiety disorders.

The level of chronic anxiety in Israel is so great and so constant that it is the ideal place for research on cognitive therapy, psychologist Rhonda Adessky said in an interview.

"Israel is a lab, a perfect lab for trauma," observed Adessky, who moved to Israel after teaching at Yale University. "There is constant terror, so the conditions are unique compared to anywhere else in the world. You can't say here, after a terrorist incident, that you are no longer living in terror, that it is over."

Adessky was among those who helped open Israel's first clinic that uses cognitive behavioural therapy (CBT) to deal with PTSD. It was opened about a year ago at Hadassah Hospital in Ein Kerem.

Patients have included victims of the Dolfinaria suicide-bombing, residents of Gilo who have come under regular Palestinian assault and victims of the Versailles wedding reception hall tragedy in which dozens of celebrants had the floors they were dancing on cave in.

Adessky, 34, is the centre's co-director with Sara Freedman. Other personnel include the hospital's chief of psychiatry, Dr. Arieh Shalev, and professor Edna Foa, a world expert in cognitive therapy.

Adessky said that even though cognitive therapy has been shown by research to be the most effective way of dealing with PTSD, Israel has never had a clinic using this type of therapy until now.

Called the Centre for Treatment of Stress and Anxiety Disorders, the clinic is helping victims of suicide bombings and their families, among others, deal with the emotional toll and turmoil they've suffered.

What makes cognitive therapy an excellent choice, Adessky said, is not only the effectiveness of its protocol, but the fact that it is a relatively short-term approach, needing as few as 10 sessions over a few months.

Adessky explained that cognitive therapy seeks to make people cope better with anxiety and psychological trauma by "changing the belief system" of the individual, rather than by directly treating the chronic symptoms of PTSD themselves, including anxiety, flashbacks, sleeplessness, panic attacks and depression. PTSD symptoms, she noted, can also surface years after a traumatic incident.

One key to the behavioural therapy approach is to transform a traumatic event from something that is re-lived in one's psyche over and over again into an objective memory. And that is done by altering the "belief system," by changing how people interpret the traumatic event.

To that end, techniques used in cognitive behavioural therapy include biofeedback, imaging techniques and progressive muscle relaxation.

Sufferers from PTSD, according to the centre's literature, often avoid places and things that remind them of the terror.

"This means that many will not go anywhere near where the incident took place, avoid listening to the news, and are unwilling to talk about the experience."

Why did it take so long to open a cognitive therapy clinic in Israel?

Adessky said that, first, cognitive therapy was available in Israel in a very limited way through psychologists in private practice.

Second, psychological therapy in Israel has been dominated mostly by "European" schools of therapy, such as psychoanalysis. Cognitive therapy, by contrast, has mostly been practised in the United States, Canada and Great Britain.

With the centre now established, however, Adessky said plans are for the it to fully implement a three-pronged agenda. In addition to patient therapy, the centre will be used as a training site for therapists and for research.

For example, she said, research is now being conducted in Efrat on the West Bank.

"We are collecting data on the belief systems, coping styles, personality factors and stress levels of Israelis living in Efrat who are under constant threat of being shot as well as terror attacks to determine how they are affected by such on-going stress.

"The Efrat group will be compared to a demographically equal control group living in a quieter, calmer neighborhood in Israel."

It is hoped that the centre will become "an internationally recognized training and research institute" for CBT, Adessky said.

Such high ambitions, however, do not come cheap. The budget for the first two years of the centre, officially a pilot project, is $550,000 (US).

It is worth it, Adessky said. The centre "will be a tremendous contribution to the field of psychology."

Chief rabbi of Rome to step down

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Rabbi Elio Toaff's surprise announcement to step down as chief rabbi of Rome after half a century as spiritual leader of the oldest Jewish community in Europe has shocked many local residents.

The 86-year-old rabbi made the announcement last week during Hoshanah Rabbah services at Rome's Great Synagogue.

"It is time to take my leave of you. I am doing so by my own free choice, and with great emotion. I hope that a young man will take up the reins of this ancient community," Rabbi Toaff said.

Rabbi Toaff's announcement stunned the congregation, particularly at a time of world crisis.

Many broke into tears. Others shouted "Don't leave us!" Congregants then gave Toaff a 10-minute ovation.

"It seems impossible to everyone that in such a difficult moment, after the attacks on the U.S. and with the war in Afghanistan and the threats of Osama bin Laden, the community can go forward without its chief rabbi," wrote Claudia Terracina, a Rome journalist who is a member of the local community.

Chief Rabbi Toaff

Italy has no national chief rabbi, and the Rome post is the country's most visible Jewish religious position.

A short, spry man with a distinctive goatee, Rabbi Toaff – who fought the Nazis as a partisan during World War II – has become a national figure since he took up the Rome post in 1951.

In 1986, he welcomed Pope John Paul II for the first-ever visit by a pope to a synagogue.

Affectionately known as "the professor," he is regularly quoted in the media. A recent biography of the rabbi was a best-seller.

Jews have lived in Rome for more than 2,000 years. With 15,000 of the country's 35,000 Jews, the city has Italy's largest Jewish community.

Basketball pioneer Alex Fisher inducted into Hall of Fame

By BEN FISHER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Alex Fisher never played a minute in an NBA game, yet he is one of the most influential builders of the sport of basketball in Canada.

Last weekend, he was inducted, along with 12 others, into the Canadian Basketball Hall of fame in Almonte, Ont.

His induction serves as a thank you. Thank you for managing the Nortown Tri-Bells to Toronto's first senior national title. Thank you for bringing the Harlem Globetrotters to Canada for the first time. Thank you for leading a Canadian basketball team to the Maccabiah Games. All these accomplishments give me plenty of reason to sing his praises... not to mention that he is my grandfather.

Alex became interested in basketball when he and his childhood friends would play on the local courts during the mid- to late 1920s. This was the birth of an addiction that would last for years. He became a familiar name to Toronto basketball fans when he formed the Nortown Tri-Bells and took control as team manager in the late 1940s.

Alex Fisher

Under him, the Tri-Bells became a dominant team in the Toronto senior league, reaching the provincial finals in the 1951-52 season, a step below the nationals. The following campaign was the team's breakthrough season, when they reached their pinnacle, winning the Canadian championship in dramatic fashion over the University of Alberta Golden Bears. Alex called it his "greatest achievement" in basketball.

Players like Freddie Thomas, Bud Natanson and "Sharpy" Litvak became well-known across Canada. Paul Thomas, a lifelong friend, coached the team that season.

"Every province had their own Alex Fisher," Thomas said, "but his passion for the game was rare."

While many who followed the Tri-Bells considered the championship to be their crowning achievement, others felt it was their game against the Harlem Globetrotters on Nov. 21, 1953 at the Mutual Street Arena. The game marked the Globetrotters' first visit to Canada. Once again, Alex was the man behind it all, organizing and funding the event.

Due to their sudden exposure, the Tri-Bells became popular inside and outside Toronto. In order to feed the public desire for Tri-Bell basketball, Fisher created a junior league and an intermediate league team, each maintaining the Tri-Bell name. Following in the footsteps of the senior team, they found success in their respective leagues, with the juniors winning two league titles and the intermediates winning one. Between the three teams, Fisher created what he considered to be a dynasty. More than a dynasty, he had contributed greatly to building basketball in Ontario by developing a feeder system for senior men's teams.

His other great contribution to Canadian basketball came in leading the first Canadian team to compete in Israel at the 1953 Maccabiah Games. Canada has fielded a team in every Maccabiah since, thanks in part to his contributions. Fisher went from heading up the basketball team to an incredible 30-year run as president of Maccabi Canada.

He may never have played in the NBA, but Alex Fisher's contributions to basketball in Canada certainly make him a deserving inductee into the Canadian Basketball Hall of Fame.

Match against Austria set for Ramat Gan Oct. 27

By ELI SHVIDLER
and DORON BERGERFREUND
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's national soccer team will play Austria in its crucial World Cup qualifying match at the National Stadium in Ramat Gan on Oct. 27, FIFA announced last week.

The game, which was originally scheduled for last Sunday, had been postponed by FIFA President Sepp Blatter following the accidental downing of a Siberia Airlines plane two weeks ago. Initially, there were fears the crash was a result of terrorist action against Israel.

Gavri Levy, chair of the Israel Football Association met in Prague with his Austrian counterpart, Beppo Mauhart, in a bid to end the short dispute between the two nations and to find an amicable solution to the problem. The dispute erupted when the Austrian team, citing security concerns, announced it would not travel to Israel for the game.

Reports from Vienna suggest the Austrian foreign ministry put great pressure on the Austrian Football Association to change its mind about coming to Israel for the match. "We do not want to appear to the world as a nation that has given in to terrorists," a senior foreign office official told Austrian journalists last week.

An official Austrian FA poll has shown the majority of their fans do not believe they will hold off Israel and reach the playoff stage against Turkey.

A draw would be enough for Austria to advance to the playoff qualifier. The poll found 56 percent of fans believed Austria would lose to Israel. Some 38,000 supporters took part in the poll.

Court rejects appeal for Maccabiah bridge disaster

JERUSALEM — The Tel Aviv District Court has rejected an appeal by five Israeli men convicted of negligence offenses arising from the bridge collapse at the opening ceremony of the 1997 Maccabiah Games.

Four members of the Australian contingent to the games were killed in the Ramat Gan tragedy and 69 were injured.

The judges said the five showed low ethical standards and should request forgiveness from the victims and families for "the sin of arrogance" and for causing death and damage through negligence.

On June 5 last year, the Tel Aviv Magistrate's Court handed out prison terms to four of the five men responsible for the bridge collapse.

Engineer Micha Bar-Ilan was sentenced to 21 months; subcontractors Yehoshua Ben-Ezra and Baruch Karagola received 15-month terms; Irgunit company owner Adam Mishori was given nine months; and Yoram Eyal, chair of the Maccabiah organizing committee, was sentenced to six months, but will do community service work in lieu of incarceration.

The five men were convicted in April 2000 on counts of causing death and damage through negligence.

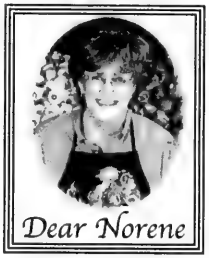
PEAR-ALMOND GRATIN

1/2 cup sugar
1/4 cup dry white wine
1 tblsp. lemon juice
1 tblsp. orange juice
1/2 cup sliced almonds
1 tblsp. grated lemon peel
1 tblsp. grated orange peel
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
5 pears, peeled, cored & sliced lengthwise, 1/2" thick

In saucepan, combine wine, orange & lemon juices and boil to reduce by half. Add sugar. Chop 1/4 cup almonds and mix with lemon peel, orange peel, and cinnamon. Set aside. Grease 10" pie pan. Layer 1/2 of the pear slices and top with chopped almond mixture. Layer the rest of the pears and top with the 1/4 cup remaining almonds; pour wine mixture over the pears. Bake in 400°F oven for about 25 minutes until top is golden brown.

About Food



By NORENE GILLETZ

I have many foodie friends around the globe. Many are cooking teachers, others are cookbook authors, some are caterers. June Jacobs fits into all three categories. She is a director of the New York Association of Cooking Teachers and a certified culinary professional. She also leads food-and-wine tours to France and other parts of the world.

Everyone wants to be able to present an impressive and delicious meal to family and friends with as little effort as possible. June's informative, tip-packed cookbook, Festivals Cooks at Home ($19.95 U.S.) is not kosher, but many of the 128 recipes can be adapted easily.

She also offers wine tips throughout. Check out her recipe for Falafel-Crusted Salmon on a Bed of Spinach at www.festivals.com. You'll never be afraid to give a dinner party again!

For dessert, June recommends this easy decadent cake. She says "It's a good idea to make multiples since not only is it utterly delicious, but you can keep it (when properly wrapped) up to four months in your freezer. I know this is so because I found one in my freezer after that long, and served it most successfully!"

JUNE JACOBS' CHOCOLATE TRUFFLE CAKE

16 oz. best quality semi-sweet chocolate
1/2 cup unsalted butter
1 1/2 tsp. flour
1 tsp. hot water
4 large eggs, separated
1 1/3 tsp. sugar
whipped cream for topping unsweetened cocoa for topping

Preheat oven to 425F. Grease the bottom (only) of an 8-inch springform pan.

Melt chocolate and butter in the top of double boiler over simmering water. When melted, transfer into a bowl, and add flour, water, and blend well. Add egg yolks one at a time, beating after each addition.

Beat egg whites until very frothy. Add the sugar and continue beating until they are stiff and shiny, but not dry. Fold into the chocolate mixture.

Pour into pan and bake for 15 minutes, only! The cake will look very undone in the centre.

Cool. Whip cream until soft peaks form. Spread a very thick layer over top of cake, smoothing with spatula. Shake unsweetened cocoa through a sieve over the whipped cream. Use a doily to make a design on the whipped cream if you wish. Cut the cake while cold, but let is stand at room temperature for about 15 minutes before serving. Makes 8 servings.

Anthrax scare in community

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The international bio-terrorism scare reached into the Jewish community last week as at least 11 organizations in Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa and Windsor received letters purporting to contain anthrax-laced white powder.

Police seized the letters and dispatched them for analysis. Test results proved negative.

At least two of the letters contained vicious and threatening diatribes that promised Jews death, and claimed to speak on behalf of Islamic jihad. One of the letters, received by the Begin-Sadat (BESA) Centre in Montreal, featured a crescent-shaped mark at the top of the page.

Police sealed the office building occupied by the BESA Centre and quarantined staff for six hours before releasing them. A hazardous waste removal unit, dressed in high-tech bio-hazard suits, removed the letter and its contents, said Thomas Hecht, founder and chair of the BESA Centre.

"I was pretty shook up," he admitted. "This is a declaration of war against the Jewish people... It is a hate crime."

In Toronto, six organizations received similar letters. One of the letters, sent to the Miles S. Nadal Bloor Jewish Community Centre, was handed to the police without being opened.

Other recipients of the letters included the United Israel Appeal (UIA) and Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS), both of which occupy offices in the Lipa Green Building; the Holy Blossom Temple; Na'amat Toronto; Jewish studies department, York University; B'nai Brith Canada; the Israeli Consulate in Toronto; Ottawa Jewish Community Centre; and the Jewish National Fund (JNF) Windsor.

MOURNING A COLLEAGUE: Members of the Knesset last week grieved for the murdered cabinet minister Rechavan Ze'evi. The black ribbon of mourning was draped accross Ze'evi's chair. Since the murder, Israel has launched its biggest military operation in the West Bank since 1993. Israel has demanded the arrest of the PFLP terrorists who claimed credit for Ze'evi's assassination.

Arafat promotes terror: Barak

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak said he remains committed to the creation of a Palestinian state, but Israel will not have a partner with which to negotiate until Yasser Arafat stops behaving like a "terrorist thug."

Over the past year, the Palestinian Authority chairman has "promoted and encouraged" violence among his own people and "closed his eyes" to the terrorism of militant Islamic groups, Barak charged. Arafat should not be rewarded by the West until he is held accountable, he said.

"Arafat should be judged by his behaviour, not his rhetoric," Barak said last week, during his first visit to Montreal.

Barak said the West should give Arafat "a second opportunity" only if he reins in Hamas, Islamic Jihad and certain elements of the Hezbollah, which have been identified as terrorist groups by the CIA.

The News in Brief

Canada

Learn to Read Hebrew

TORONTO — Canadian synagogues in more than a dozen cities are taking part in the annual Read Hebrew America & Canada program being held in November. The crash course is a project of the New York-based National Jewish Outreach Program (NJOP), and involves 1,000 Jewish institutions across the continent. For details, call NJOP at 1-800-44-HEBRE(W) or visit www.njop.org.

Funding Stopped

VANCOUVER — Citing a sharp rise in costs, British Columbia has announced it will stop funding a test that detects a breast cancer gene prevalent among Jewish women, the Western Jewish Bulletin reports. Normally, a screening at the B.C. Cancer Centre costs $600. But the cost of a screening for the genes associated with breast cancer has climbed to $3,850 per test since the process was patented by a U.S. firm. The process identifies genes thought to be carried by one percent of Ashkenazi women – about 10 times the proportion in the general community.

Israel

Settlements Grow

JERUSALEM — The number of homes in Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip has grown by 62 percent since peace talks with Palestinians began in 1993, according to Peace Now. Citing figures from Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics, the group said that in 1993 there were 32,750 housing units in Jewish settlements; since then, another 20,371 have been added.

Settler Teen Shot

JERUSALEM — An Israeli teenager was shot and wounded by an Israeli soldier at a checkpoint in the Gaza Strip last week. The settler, who was driving Palestinian workers through the checkpoint, got out of his car and advanced in a "threatening" manner toward the checkpoint, according to the Israel Defence Force. The IDF apologized for the incident.

World

Israeli's Body Found

NEW YORK — A body extracted from the rubble of the World Trade Center has been identified as an Israeli. Shai Levinhar, 29, worked for the bond trading firm Cantor Fitzgerald on the 103rd floor of one of the Twin Towers.

Shloshim Service

NEW YORK — More than 400 people gathered at the Park East Synagogue here last week for a shloshim service marking the end of the 30-day mourning period for victims of the World Trade Center. Among those at the service were several firefighters. Another shloshim service took place at Manhattan's Jewish Community Centre.

Relief Efforts

NEW YORK — Jewish organizations have raised more than $6 million for relief efforts stemming from the Sept. 11 terror attacks. An estimated $850 million has been raised for relief efforts in general, through a wide variety of organizations, campaigns and corporate gifts.

Flight Diverted

NEW YORK — A Delta Air Lines flight from Atlanta to Newark was diverted to Charlotte, N.C., last week after passengers complained of two "Middle Eastern" men who were huddled in the back of the plane speaking a language other than English. After the plane landed in Charlotte, investigators found that the two were Orthodox Jews who had been praying. The flight continued to Newark after officials were satisfied there was no threat.

Rabbi's Trial

NEWARK — The trial of a New Jersey rabbi charged with arranging the murder of his wife started last week. Rabbi Fred Neulander, who plans to testify in his own defence, has pleaded not guilty. His wife, Carol, was found beaten to death at the couple's home in 1994. Rabbi Neulander could face the death penalty if convicted.

Birthright Extended

NEW YORK — A program that sends young Jews on free trips to Israel has extended its registration deadline to Nov. 5 in the hope of attracting more participants for winter trips. Officials with Birthright Israel say only 8,000 North American Jews have signed up this year compared to 25,000 at this time last year.

Work 'Completed'

BERN — A group overseeing the restitution of funds from Holocaust-era dormant accounts in Swiss banks says it has completed its work. Following a four-year effort to satisfy claims, the Claims Resolution Tribunal says it has paid $10 million to heirs of Holocaust victims.

Deportation Marked

ROME — Several events cosponsored by city officials and Jewish groups were planned for last week to mark the 58th anniversary of the Nazi deportation of Jews from Rome: a theatre performance, a roundtable discussion about restitution and a presentation of educational works about the Holocaust.

Manley Plans Mideast Trip

OTTAWA — Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley is planning a trip to the Middle East to shore up the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and boost the U.S.-led anti-terrorist coalition.

Manley plans to visit Israel and the Palestinian autonomous regions early next month, and may also make stops in Lebanon and Syria. Details weren't available last week.

A spokesperson for Manley was quoted last week as saying the minister seeks to "keep on top" of the Mideast peace process, and to ensure that the current coalition remains strong.

Manley first visited the region last May. He met with Palestinian President Yasser Arafat and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, as well as the leaders of Egypt and Jordan.

He made headlines here at home when he reiterated Canada's opposition to Israel's settlement policy, which he called an "obstacle" to peace.

Manley announced $5 million in government assistance to help create jobs and reduce poverty in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Harris praised as 'good friend' of the community

Ontario premier announces resignation

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Premier Mike Harris was praised last week as the first Ontario leader to loosen the public purse strings in order to help Jewish day schools, but he was also criticized as someone whose other policies were inimical to Jewish values.

Harris surprised many last Tuesday by announcing he would step down as premier as soon as a replacement is chosen. The Progressive Conservative leader, elected in 1995 and again in 1999, said he was quitting for personal reasons.

Doubtless, Harris will be remembered in the Jewish community as the premier who finally came to the aid of faith-based schools with his bombshell budget last spring, which contained a provincial tax credit for parents of children in independent and private schools.

"He was a good friend to the Jewish community," said Ed Morgan, Ontario regional chair of Canadian Jewish Congress. "We won't soon forget the tax credit. On Jewish issues, he came through for the community each time."

Former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Ontario Premier Michael Harris in Toronto in 1999.

CJC sent Harris a letter last week, thanking the premier for the education tax credit.

Starting next year, parents will be eligible for a tax credit of up to $700 per child, or 10 percent of the first $7,000 of tuition fees. To be phased in over five years, the credit will increase 20 percent per year, and eventually, will be worth up to $3,500 per child annually.

The measure will eventually release some $300 million a year into funding the 102,000 children enrolled in Ontario's private schools, including 12,000 in 42 Jewish day schools and yeshivot.

Observers last week agreed the premier had an appreciation for Jewish concerns. They point out that in 1998, the Tories became the first government in Canada, and only the second in the world after Israel, to pass a law marking the Holocaust. The Holocaust Memorial Day Act set aside Yom Hashoah as a day of remembrance, memorial and education, and has since been copied by other provinces.

However, critics described his policies on the environment, poverty, education and health care as being diametrically opposed to the philosophy of tikkun olam (repair of the world).

Carly Steinman, social action co-ordinator for the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, noted that in his resignation speech, Harris commended his government for providing for Ontario's vulnerable.

"I am certain that the 'vulnerable' breathed sighs of relief" when Harris announced he would quit, Steinman told The CJN.

"The ideology of this government has been a direct affront to our Jewish values," Steinman stated. "Massive cuts to social assistance, mandatory workfare programs for welfare recipients, repeal of the Rental Housing Protection Act in an af-

Mike (Meyer) Rogow ז"ל

Mr. Mike Rogow, President of Steeles Memorial Chapel and President of Adath Sholom Synagogue passed away on Sunday, May 6, 2001 (13 Iyar) at the age of 81.

Mike Rogow was born and grew up in Toronto. Although he spent most of his career working in Real Estate he will be best remembered for his community work.

Mike volunteered with the Circle of Care, delivering Meals on Wheels every Tuesday. He also encouraged others to join him in this worthwhile activity.

Mike has held various positions on the executive of Steeles Memorial Chapel and even in his last position as President he would assist the staff by answering the phones on Sunday morning. Mike was not concerned with titles but was rather concerned with how he as an individual could help.

Mike's other community minded endeavors included being involved with the Association for the Welfare of Israel's Soldiers. He also assisted the Sunshine Foundation and had the opportunity to accompany a group of terminally ill children on a one-day trip to Disney World a number of years ago.

Mike was also involved very heavily with the Adath Sholom Synagogue where he spent a great deal of his energy. He not only opened up the synagogue every morning prior to morning services but he also attended all services. He also spent a great deal of his time as a volunteer on the various fund-raising activities that the synagogue organized. He was a member of the Ivansker Society and a World War II veteran.

Mike not only gave of his own time and energy but strongly encouraged others to do the same.

Become well-informed

From the editor's desk

The linkage argument that terror was and is directed against the United States because of its relationship to Israel is made by people who are either genuinely ill-informed about Israel or genuinely ill-inclined toward Israel.

Part of the argument stems from the constant flow of ugly images generated by the violence between Israel and the Palestinians that has continued unabated for the last 13 months.

The violence, Palestinian spokespeople explain to the western audience, among whom are the ill-informed and the ill-inclined, is caused by "the occupation."

This explanation is patently false.

Westerners understand the term "occupation" to refer to the existence of the Jewish "settlements" in the West Bank and Gaza. The Palestinian leadership understands the term to refer to the existence of the Jewish State itself. This conclusion is inescapable considering that the PA was offered, by the government of Israel at Camp David in July 2000, the dismantling of virtually all of the settlements, an offer which it rejected as inadequate because it did not also include the right of all Palestinian "refugees" to return to their pre-1948 homes and an acknowledgement that there was no historical or religious claim by the Jews upon Jerusalem.

Most westerners were startled by the Palestinian leaders' rejection of the Israeli offer. That is why the campaign of violence was launched: to set in motion a new train of events that would steamroll loud and vociferous criticism from the world into Israel's government.

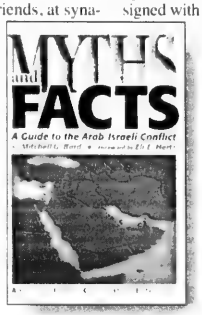
With the images of violent confrontation broadcast almost daily, Palestinian spokespeople explain the conflict to a bleary-eyed world in terms the Palestinians themselves have fashioned, as if there were no history, no context, no record, no truth to the conflict prior to Sept. 28, 2000, the start of the current violence.

But, of course, there is a history and a context and a truth to the conflict.

As we all know – indeed, as has been made unambiguously plain – the war being waged by the bin Laden fellowship targets the Jews qua Jews and qua citizens of the West.

The most effective way we can defend ourselves in this war is to see ourselves as ambassadors for the truth, as it were. We must therefore, each one of us, become as well informed as possible on the context of the Middle East conflict, on Jewish history, on modern Zionism. We must find a way to add to the generally busy pace of our lives, a regular schedule of reading, study or discussion concerning the justice of Israel's case.

This can be achieved in an organized fashion with groups of friends, at synagogues, social clubs or schools, or it can be done individually and privately.



The essence, however, is to realize that, like it or not, we are all involved. We must therefore respond.

There are a great many outstanding resources to aid us in becoming better informed.

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), about whom I have written before in this space, is the community's pre-eminent storehouse of experts and expertise on the Middle East conflict. It is renowned for its lobbying and research. Over the years the CIC has published a number of invaluable documents. Many of them are available on the organization's Web site, which, in revamped format, will be accessible to the public at the beginning of November. The documents and a great many links to other documents can be reached at www.cicweb.ca.

Another invaluable resource is Myths and Facts: A Guide to the Arab-Israeli Conflict, by Mitchell G. Bard. The most recent volume arrived on my desk last week. It is outstanding.

No longer a slim volume, the text is 464 pages divided into 26 chapters covering a wide range of subjects from "Israel's Roots" to the "al-Aksa Intifada" and "Arab/Muslim Attitudes Toward Israel."

The discussions are concise yet thoroughly canvassed. In addition, a number of appendices, tables and maps of key documents and records such as the Oslo agreements and the peace treaties Israel signed with Egypt and Jordan are conveniently arranged for the reader's quick access.

"Too many people are unfamiliar with the basic history of the conflict," Bard writes in the press release accompanying the book, "or simply don't have concise, fact-based replies to falsehoods propagated about the Middle East issues. I want to arm students of all ages with the information they need to understand and critique what they hear and see in the press, on campuses and in their communities."

With this book, Bard has succeeded.

Myths and Facts will soon be available in local bookstores and can be ordered online at www.JewishVirtualLibrary.org. The retail price is $9.95 (US) with discounts available for volume purchases and non-profit institutions.

Anti-terrorism bill takes aim at hate propaganda

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada will beef up its provisions against hate propaganda as part of an anti-terrorism package introduced last week by the federal government.

The measures, included as part of the government's omnibus anti-terrorism bill, will give courts power to order the deletion of publicly available hate propaganda from computer systems, would create a new offense of hate-motivated mischief against places of worship and would amend the Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRA) to explicitly prohibit the dissemination of hatred or discrimination on the Internet.

Canadian Jewish Congress and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre applauded the provisions, though the two organizations were divided on other government proposals that would give law enforcement the authority to detain terrorism suspects and compel witnesses to testify in special hearings.

The broader anti-terrorism bill tabled last week was introduced in the wake of the unprecedented attacks in New York and Washington that killed as many as 6,000 people.

"The horrific events of Sept. 11 remind us that we must continue to work with other nations to confront terrorism and ensure the full force of Canadian law is brought to bear against those who support, plan and carry out acts of terror – we cut off their money, find them and punish them," said Justice Minister Anne McLellan.

The proposed Anti-Terrorism Act, which has come under fire from human rights advocates for giving law enforcement too many new powers, would:

- define and designate terrorist groups and activities and make it easier to prosecute them;
- make it an offense to knowingly assist terrorist groups;
- cut off financial support for terrorists by making it a crime to collect money for terrorism and by denying charitable status to those which support terrorist groups;
- make it easier to use surveillance against terrorist groups;
- change the rules of evidence to guard information deemed of national interest from being disclosed during courtroom or other judicial proceedings;

Provisions welcomed by Wiesenthal Centre, CJC

- allow preventive arrest of terrorist suspects for up to 72 hours without charge, and impose restrictions on their release;
- compel material witnesses to testify before a judge, even in the absence of a formal trial.

Though they agreed on the bulk of the proposals in the omnibus bill, Congress and the Wiesenthal Centre parted company on support for the latter two proposals. Congress president Keith Landy said given the current climate of fear and unease, it is reasonable to temporarily tilt the balance between enhanced security and individual liberties towards security and safety.

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Wiesenthal Centre, said law enforcement agencies do not need the extra powers conferred on them by the bill. "With a little bit of fine tuning [of existing powers], they could accomplish whatever intention they have in the proposed legislation."

Canadian society has been subjected to numerous instances of criminal violence and "the Criminal Code does not require a material witness to be held in custody and I'm not sure we need that now," Adler said.

He also questioned the need to hold terrorism suspects for three days without police laying charges. Under current law, police must charge a criminal suspect within 24 hours, though they can hold him for a further three days without bail while they gather more evidence.

Landy said Congress' position is based on its reading of the mood of the Jewish community across Canada, which, like the broader community, is experiencing "tremendous alarm and fear." Attendance during recent High Holy Day services was down overall as people retreated to the safety of their homes, he pointed out.

"These are extraordinary times so it's desirable to give police a wider discretion and wider powers to investigate those who would harm our liberty and our democracy," he said.

At the same time, he continued, "we don't want to become a police state ...There has to be a balance that is struck and sometimes the balance should be more in favour of safety and security versus individual liberties. I think it should be reviewed on a periodic basis to test the temperature of our society to see if the legislation mirrors the level of comfort in our society."

Both leaders applauded the bill's proposals on hate propaganda.

Though focused primarily on anti-terrorism, the bill includes provisions on hate propaganda as part of its goal of "providing greater protection for all Canadians," said Lisette Lafontaine, senior counsel with the Department of Justice.

"It recognizes that hate against religion is the same as the hate [demonstrated] by those involved on Sept. 11". It also recognizes the need to protect groups from hate that may have increased in the wake of recent events, she said.

Amendments to the hate propaganda provisions of the Criminal Code were being contemplated in another government bill long before Sept. 11. In the aftermath of last month's terrorist attacks, the provisions were folded into Bill C-36, the anti-terrorism legislation, Lafontaine said.

Under the terms of the bill, anyone convicted of mischief, such as vandalism, against a house of worship could be liable to 10 years imprisonment if convicted on indictment and 18 months if convicted on summary conviction.

A second part of the bill would give courts power to order Internet Service Providers (ISPs) to remove hate materials from their servers. The provincial attorney-general would have to consent to a prosecution prior to bringing the case to court, Lafontaine said.

"It would parallel in cyber-space the powers a court has in the paper world," she said.

A further provision of the anti-terrorism bill would amend the CHRA to prohibit the distribution of hate materials through the Internet or any inter-connected computer network (including a private network). The CHRA as it now stands prohibits the dissemination of such material through telephonic communications. Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel, who runs a Web site that allegedly promotes hatred of Jews, argued in a case before a human rights tribunal that the provision does not include the World Wide Web. The amendment would render that argument moot.

Grassroots association brings Jews and Muslims together

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Jack Stevens and Shahid Akhtar created the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims five years ago, they felt there was a real need to provide a forum where members of the two groups could get together in a friendly, non-threatening environment.

Since the events of Sept. 11 – and even before that, with the onset of the intifadah one year ago – the group's raison d'etre has been magnified enormously.

The group still meets as it always has: irregularly, informally and in small numbers. And despite the onslaught of media coverage of current events, the ground rules haven't changes much either; politics are left outside the door as the group pursues its goal of promoting better understanding between the communities through co-existence and friendship.

"We focus on the positive aspects of bringing these communities together," said Akhtar, a native of Pakistan and a Muslim. "We want to serve as a model in Canada to show that Jews and Muslims can interact together."

The group keeps its attention focused on the Canadian scene and discusses ways Jews and Muslims can work together to build bridges, said Stevens, a Jew who is a native of Iraq."Our view was that we avoid political discussions, which always lead to the Palestinian conflict."

In the wake of the intifadah that began last year, that became difficult. "People came to the meetings very hurt and disturbed over what happened," Akhtar said. "The hate that was taking place outside Canada could be felt in Canada. We had a chance to reassure and comfort each other and talk seriously about what is happening."

But, he continued, the group's focus remained local, "to make sure that synagogues were not defaced and mosques not vandalized."

On Sept. 15, the group joined a rally at City Hall where it read a message affirming the ideals that united them, including mutual respect, life and co-existence. To make sure its message got a broader exposure, it was forwarded to all federal MPs. Akhtar noted it was also read in some synagogues.

Shahid Akhtar

Linda Somers was moved by the group's message when it was read to the congregation at Temple Emanu-El by Rabbi Debra Landsberg during a Rosh Hashanah sermon. The statement called on Jews and Muslims to reflect on the best Canadian values, including kindness, courtesy and respect.

Somers was inspired by Rabbi Landsberg's sermon. "We had just had the attacks and she gave a perspective that thrilled me, that all the hate and the blame directed at the Muslims was totally unconscionable, and that as Jews we've experienced [similar] hate and prejudice."

Rabbi Landsberg, who only recently assumed the pulpit at the Reform temple, said she learned of the group through a member of the congregation, and she endorses its goal.

"Any forum that allows us to get together to explore commonalities and not be defined by our extreme brethren is important," she said.

> 'Any forum that allows us to get together to explore commonalities and not be defined by our extreme brethren is important'

The congregation's response has been "very positive," with substantial interest expressed in "exploring dialogue" with Muslim neighbours, she added.

Somers did her bit in bringing people together when she hosted a coffee klatsch at her home attended by 11 participants, split more or less evenly between Jews and Muslims.

She also helped arrange an oral presentation on Islam by Akhtar at her mother's Hadassah-WIZO chapter, Tel Hai.

"I'm doing this because my heart was broken on Sept. 11 and I know that the innocent God-fearing and law-abiding Muslims living in Canada would take the heat for it," she said.

"My goal is to build some small bridges with people who are here and are amenable ...I don't want to be part of hatred and fear."

Stevens, who changed his name from Tzemach when he moved to Canada in 1964, said there was little communication between Canadian Jews and Muslims in the mid 1990s. There were Jewish/Christian organizations and multifaith groups, but "nothing really between Jews and Muslims."

At the time, Stevens, now retired, and Akhtar were friends and co-workers at the Ministry of Community and Social Services. In late 1996 they came up with the idea of spearheading a joint association.

Their first meetings were small, with perhaps 10-20 people attending. The group's largest gathering was held at B'nai Brith Canada's North York headquarters, with about 60 people attending.

Akhtar believes the association, which includes Shiite and Sunni Muslims, Pakistanis, Arabs and Indians, can "show that Jews and Muslims can interact together."

It's the "Canadian" in the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims that he wants to stress.

"It's a very Canadian message," he said. "Our overall purpose is to make Canada a model for other countries. It's a challenge, but it's a challenge that's very achievable."

Exclusive: Israeli Supreme Court Justice Englard

By Anna Morgan
Staff Reporter

Israeli issues now relevant in N. America

TORONTO — For decades Israel has had to balance the need for public security with concerns for basic human rights and civil liberties.

In an exclusive interview with The Canadian Jewish News, Israeli Supreme Court Justice Itzhak Englard said these issues have now become relevant in Canada and the United States.

Englard was appointed to the Supreme Court in 1997. He was the dean of the law school at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, has authored many books and articles and received the Israel Prize for law in 1997.

"A judicial system in a democratic country must always weigh the different legitimate objectives and interests of a society," Englard said.

In some areas of the law, such as in private law, you can often find a solution where you can be completely satisfied, he said.

However, when a society has to combat violence and crime, balancing the competing interests becomes more difficult.

For Englard, there is a big difference between common crimes and the war on terrorism.

Common criminals still play according to some rules. They accept society and the social order. They may feel they have justification for what they have done, but we aim for rehabilitation.

Therefore, Englard explained, when dealing with common crime, there might be a question of security, but it would be important to preserve basic human rights because we are still inside the general rules of the collectivity.

War, on the other hand, is not the same. During a war, the lives of all citizens are endangered.

The laws of war are completely different – there are many international conventions regulating some of the basic rules in warlike situations, Englard said. But, sad as it may sound, death and killing are part of war.

The problem is that terrorism falls somewhere between a peaceful society and a conflicted one.

"In many respects, it's worse than war because terrorists are not bound by any rules, nor do they abide by any rules. Terrorists kill innocent people with the objective of destroying the social order. Their interest is to spread fear through the very cruelty of their acts.

"This puts democracy under additional pressure. The tension heightens between basic human rights, which you want to preserve, and the need to safeguard the lives of your citizens."

The burden of responsibility this places on the courts is enormous, and the system that has developed is complex.

Itzhak Englard

As an example, Englard described a situation where a suspected terrorist has been arrested. The police believe that a bomb has been planted, but they don't know where.

The courts have been asked whether the police can use torture in this type of "ticking bomb" scenario.

On one hand, you might say it is never permissible to use torture; human dignity doesn't allow it. Yet how can you assume the responsibility for hundreds of lives because you are maintaining that principle?

In 1987, the Landau Commission in Israel decided that in certain situations it was permissible to use physical force to obtain information. In 1999, the Israeli Supreme Court overturned the commission's findings, deciding that it is not legitimate to give permission to torture.

"A legal system in a democracy cannot permit the use of torture beforehand. We are bound by international conventions.

"But in very extreme circumstances," Englard explained, "the person who used force to obtain information may have an excuse."

The courts found they could not give permission for torture in advance. However, where terrorism is concerned, and only in certain situations, they could excuse it afterwards.

When dealing with terrorism, the notion of self-defence is very important, Englard said. Most people would agree that it is better to kill than to be killed. Within the Jewish tradition, it is permitted to hurt an aggressor, but never more than necessary. It is always important to remain within the boundaries of self-defence and never resort to revenge.

When human rights are diminished in any way, Englard noted, Israel is committed to the basic principle of judicial review. Military decisions or measures, the enforcement by police, military or secret service are all subject to judicial supervision.

"The situation isn't ideal, but we are very conscious of the importance of human rights in every respect."

A cynical facade behind which, death

Last week was a particularly bad one in Israel, the West Bank and Gaza. Violence was again ascendant; reason and the chance for calm, if not peace, were once again cut down by the swords of terrorists and their allies. The murder of Israel's Tourism Minister, Rechavam Ze'evi, brought the inevitable response from Israel. And because the murder was particularly egregious, substantively and symbolically, the response has been particularly severe.

In the new violent cycle, Palestinians have been launching mortars at Jewish neighbourhoods; Israeli tanks now ring six West Bank cities. And as of this writing, some 20 Palestinians have died in the fighting.

Acceding to the requests of American and European governments to enter into a ceasefire with the Palestinian Authority (PA), Israel, two weeks ago, also eased restrictions it had imposed on the movement of Palestinians into Israel from beyond the Green Line. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon even spoke about the creation of an independent Palestinian state.

Seeing their chance to infiltrate, operatives of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), within hours of the lifting of the travel restrictions, crossed into Israel to execute their attack on Ze'evi, thereby sabotaging what was a suddenly burgeoning sense of mini-optimism about a ceasefire and beyond.

Israel knows who planned and who committed Ze'evi's murder and has asked for their extradition from the PA. The PA has refused.

Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat is not being accused of having sent the PFLP operatives to their murderous mission. But he is accused of ignoring his promises, yet again, to countless governments and foreign diplomats to prevent attacks during the ceasefire. He is also accused of failing his responsibility to his own people, yearning simply to build a normal life and to get out from the economic dead-end Arafat has caused.

Having been betrayed, once more, by Arafat's duplicity and feigned impotence, Israel must take measures to protect its citizens and it alone should determine what those measures will be.

With the violence spiralling upwards, Arafat cynically plays the role of victim, calling upon the very international community he has again duped with his unreliability, prevarication and disingenuous shrug-of-the-shoulder cry of helplessness, to help him in his campaign against Israel.

But the international community should rebuff Arafat's faux cri de coeur. It should compel him, finally, to choose. Will he fulfil his promises? Will he finally put an end to the terrorism that strikes in the name of the Palestinian people, like a poisonous snake, at the heel of a limping, straggling possibility of peace? Once and for all, he must cast aside the cynical facade, which for years has been his trademark face to the world but behind which he has only ever delivered hatred, misery and death to his own people.

Must not accept prejudice

I cried when I read Ron Csillag's piece, "A little prejudice?" in the Oct. 11 CJN. As an alumnus of the March of the Living and the March of Remembrance and Hope, I am loath to accept prejudice as a necessary evil, even in our current state of crisis. For a Jewish newspaper to publish an article advocating racial profiling and bigotry is the ultimate disgrace to the memory of the victims of the Holocaust and victims of genocide throughout history. We should truly be ashamed of ourselves for promoting the very practices that resulted in the murder of six million of our people. Let us instead follow what our religion teaches, "ve'ahavta l're'acha kamocha," and let us be the first to condemn any sort of racism in our midst. While profiling in Israel may have prevented attacks in the past, does it not foster an environment of fear and hatred throughout the country? Prejudice solves no problems; it only exacerbates them. To distil the current situation into a choice between becoming a victim of terror or a perpetrator of discrimination would only intensify the tragedy that we are now experiencing.

Rae Brager
Toronto

(Editor's note: The column absolutely did not advocate racial profiling and bigotry. Mr. Csillag candidly admitted to struggling with the issues and felt "unnerved" by the unprecedented new situation after Sept. 11, which he felt may leave us all no choice but to be more vigilant.)

Objects to poem

My jaw dropped when I read the poem, Palestinians by Ken Sherman (CJN, Sept. 28).

Do we in the Jewish community believe that Palestinians choose the grinding poverty that marks many of their lives? Certainly, the political, social and economic factors that contribute to this "squalour" are complex. While we may have different understandings of why it exists – to convince ourselves that it is a simple matter of choice is not only false, but an affront to our Jewish values – such as letting other people's dignity be as precious to us as our own.

I sincerely hope that our Palestinian neighbours in Canada did not pick up a copy of this issue. They would see their entire populace reduced to a four-line rhyming jingle, chastizing them for choosing squalour and poverty. This does not foster positive relationships between our peoples – at a time when we may need it most.

Carly Steinman
Toronto

Jewish immigration

Darcie Richler's assertions (CJN, Sept. 20) about Jewish immigrants in general and Holocaust survivors in particular are false.

After dismissing any valuable contribution to the Jewish community by immigrants during the first half of the 20th century, Richler writes: "Many Holocaust survivors intermarried, eliminated their ethnicity and refused to be part of the Jewish community. The children of that generation did not obtain a strong Jewish identity, so they could not be expected to pass on strong values to their children."

It is beyond my comprehension how The CJN could have published something so outrageous. Since there are many misinformed and inexperienced young journalists like Richler, it is the paper's duty to teach them of the immense contributions in maintaining and fostering a vibrant Jewish life in North America made by the hundreds of thousands of Jewish immigrants, especially by the already three generations of Holocaust survivors.

Arafat could help, if he wanted

Yasser Arafat, the Nobel Peace Prize winner, now vigorously condemns terrorism and offers his full support to President George W. Bush's war on terrorism. But he began the intifadah by releasing the most dangerous terrorists from jail. He knows the leaders who inspire Palestinian youth to suicide bombings. If he wants to help the United States he can do so very easily. Many of the terrorist groups are his neighbours. Action should start at home.

Bin there

I would like to play the "root cause game." Some see the Sept. 11 attack on America as stemming from U.S. support of Israel. Others see it as an example of dispirited people naturally behaving in desperate ways. These interpretations are flawed, as other writers have pointed out.

I see Sept. 11 as a continuation of a pattern that started when fundamentalist Iranian students took American hostages and humiliated the West. Former president Jimmy Carter, perhaps encumbered by his own fundamentalist metaphysical notions of religion, did not have his country behave as a superpower should have. We can recall that he tied himself into knots with indecision. The correct response would have been to issue an ultimatum and then punish Iran to the fullest extent possible. It may have meant losing the embassy staff, which would have been truly regrettable, but on balance, it would have been a smaller price to pay. American later lost thousands of lives, including 241 marines in Lebanon, and the approximately 6,000 on the sunny Tuesday morning of Sept. 11.

America's acceptance of the egregious assault in the '70s gave birth to the perverted Islam that bin Laden peddles today. Without that stunning defeat in Tehran, the mindset that believes that the United States can be brought to her knees could never have taken root.

The Israeli response

Israeli tourism minister Rechavam Ze'evi was assassinated by Palestinians on Wednesday, Oct. 17 outside his hotel room at the Jerusalem Hyatt. The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine claimed responsibility for the murder.

The Cabinet of Israel made this statement following the assassination:

The government and people of Israel are shocked and outraged by the cold-blooded assassination of minister Rechavam Ze'evi. Tonight, we mourn together with his family.

The murder of a member of the Israeli Cabinet and Knesset crosses all red lines. No democracy can tolerate such an attack on its elected officials. The responsibility lies squarely with [Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser] Arafat and the Palestinian Authority.

Rechavam Ze'evi

The writing was on the wall. The Popular Front [PFLP] announced that it was planning terrorist attacks – but Chairman Arafat and the Palestinian Authority did nothing.

Israel included Popular Front leaders on the list of terrorist fugitives submitted to Arafat – but, again, he did nothing.

Israel began, this week, to withdraw its forces and ease restrictions - serving only to open the door for terrorists to slip through.

In the interest of creating calm and advancing the cause of peace, and at the urging of our friends in the international community, we held meetings with Chairman Arafat, roadblocks were removed, and Israeli forces withdrew from Hebron. But the Palestinians only reciprocated with violence and murder. Many promises were made, but only little steps were taken to prevent terror.

The time for words has ended, and the time for deeds has come. Israel demands the extradition of those responsible for today's assassination, and expects this to be carried out immediately.

We also demand that the terrorist organizations operating in the Palestinian areas be disarmed and dismantled. Arafat must not shelter them any longer. Failure to meet these demands, which are grounded in signed agreements between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, will leave us with no choice but to view the Palestinian Authority as an entity supporting and sponsoring terror, and to act accordingly.

Israel, meanwhile, will continue to take all necessary measures to ensure the safety of its citizens.

There can be no compromise with terror. It must be eradicated, without distinction between its perpetrators and those who harbour them. The terrorists and their sponsors, including Arafat, must be told, unequivocally, that their crimes will not be tolerated by the civilized world.

We demand that Arafat stop his double-talk, and take serious and concrete action against the terrorist factions operating freely in the Palestinian Authority.

Israel shares the commitment of the international community to peace and stability. And we want peace with the Palestinian people. But peace and stability will not be achieved without decisive action from Arafat to halt terror.

The PFLP's recent record

The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), which claimed responsibility for the murder of tourism minister Rechavam Ze'evi, has a long and bloody record of terrorism and murder both inside Israel and abroad, including the Sept. 6, 1970 hijacking of four Western jetliners to Jordan, where they were blown up.

Since the outbreak of violence in the West Bank and Gaza in September last year, the PFLP has perpetrated the following attacks inside Israel:

- Feb. 8 – A car bomb exploded in Jerusalem wounding five Israeli citizens.
- March 23 – A car bomb was discovered in Jerusalem's Mea Shearim neighbourhood and safely dismantled.
- April 23 – A car bomb exploded in Or Yehuda wounding four Israeli citizens.
- May 27 – A car bomb exploded in Jerusalem's Russian Compound.
- June 1 – A bomb exploded in Mevasseret Tzion.
- June 18 – A motor scooter laden with explosives was discovered in Haifa.
- July 2 – Two car-bombs exploded in Yehud wounding 11 Israeli citizens.
- July 27 – A bomb was discovered on a bus in Jerusalem.
- Aug. 22 – A car bomb exploded in Jerusalem.
- Sept. 3 – A car bomb and three bombs exploded in Jerusalem, wounding nine Israeli citizens.

The list of 108 wanted terrorists handed over to the Palestine Authority (PA) by the government of Israel included current PFLP Secretary-General Ahmed Saadat and PFLP miltant Aahed Awalmeh. The PA did not arrest them.

The Americans' hypocrisy

By MATTHEW E. BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Jewish lawmakers in Washington are accusing the Bush administration of hypocrisy for condemning Israel's policy of targeted killings – and the State Department is coming under growing pressure to review its position.

While Israeli advocates hoped the Sept. 11 terror attacks in New York and Washington would increase empathy for the Jewish State's plight and loosen the reins in Israel's fight against terror, the State Department has continued to criticize Israel's policy of killing Palestinian terrorist leaders.

After the assassination of Israel's tourism minister, Rechavam Ze'evi, last Wednesday, pressure is likely to mount on Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to take more proactive steps against Palestinian terrorism.

Sharon has demanded that the Palestinian Authority turn over Ze'evi's killers or be deemed a supporter of terrorism – with all that implies in the changed international environment since Sept. 11.

The question remains whether the United States will continue chastising Israel for its counterterrorism actions even as the Bush administration works from a similar playbook.

Several members of the House of Representatives' International Relations Committee said last Wednesday they could not understand the difference between U.S. tactics in its war on suspected terror mastermind Osama bin Laden and his Al Qaeda network – tactics that have broad popular and political support – and Israeli tactics that the State Department criticizes.

"It seems to me that if an American pilot with a very smart weapon would succeed, through targeted assassination, to kill Osama bin Laden, he would get the Congressional Medal of Honor and a tickertape parade down Fifth Avenue," said Democratic Senator Tom Lantos, the ranking minority member of the International Relations Committee.

"And I'm just wondering what degree of hypocrisy prompts a State Department spokesman to criticize an Israeli sharpshooter for successfully putting an end to the life of a man who planned, organized and directed the assassination of 22 Israeli teenagers."

The United States has decried the Israeli policy of targeting leaders of militant Palestinian movements for assassination as perpetuating the cycle of violence.

Israel says the killings are necessary to counter the constant threat of terror and head off attacks in the planning stages. Israeli officials also note that they focus exclusively on militants and do not target Palestinian political leaders.

After the United States became the target of terrorism on Sept. 11, the State Department seemed to change its position on retaliatory tactics.

"I think when you are attacked by a terrorist and you know who the terrorist is and you can fingerprint back to the cause of the terror, you should respond," Secretary of State Colin Powell said at a news conference on Sept. 12, one day after attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon killed an estimated 5,000 people.

"If you are able to stop terrorist attacks, you should stop terrorist attacks."

Last week, however, as Israel resumed its targeted killings, the State Department resumed its criticism. The Bush administration has recently made several statements in support of the Palestinian Authority, which it deems a crucial player in American attempts to build Arab and Muslim support for its war in Afghanistan.

Assistant Secretary of State William Burns did not elaborate on the differences between the U.S. and Israeli situations, but said he felt Israel and the Palestinian Authority should look for a "political solution" instead of meeting violence with violence.

"It's not a question of handcuffing anyone," Burns told the committee last Wednesday. "It's not a question of standing" in the way "of anyone's legitimate right of self-defence."

Burns' comments enraged Democratic Senator Gary Ackerman, who asked why the United States wasn't seeking a political solution to the threat from bin Laden.

"Why is it wrong or, in State Department terms, counterproductive, for Israel to target the terrorists who bombed the Sbarro pizzeria in Jerusalem and the Dolphinarium discotheque in Tel Aviv, but right for us to target the terrorists who attacked the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon in Virginia?" Ackerman asked.

"Is it hypocrisy, or is it just inconsistency?"

Burns said he understands lawmakers' concerns about inconsistencies, and denied accusations that the State Department's rhetoric is calculated to build support for the U.S. war against bin Laden and Al Qaeda.

"We continue to approach the situation between Israelis and Palestinians, first and foremost, in an effort to do everything that we can to bring about an end to violence," Burns said. "And that's the context in which we've made the statements that we've consistently tried to make – for no other purpose than that."

Besmirching a hero's memory

The other day the mail brought me a magazine, the major part of which dealt with a man whom I fondly remember and who had an enormous impact on my life. He was Rabbi Leo Baeck, who died some 50 years ago.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The article that I read about him was yet another attempt to destroy his unique reputation.

For those who are not acquainted with the name Leo Baeck, let me rehearse the major details. He was the son of a rabbi, grew up to be a significant scholar whose books became classics, and for the majority of his life was the best-known rabbi in Germany.

When the Nazis came into power, they forced German Jewry to establish a nationwide organization with whom the government could deal. The new national community elected Rabbi Baeck to be its head, and it became his unpleasant responsibility to represent the Jewish community to a government out to get rid of every Jew in the country. In the end, the community was destroyed and Rabbi Baeck himself was transported to the concentration camp of Terezin.

Miraculously, he survived. In subsequent years, people asked themselves how it was possible for him to live when others perished, and they came to believe that this was due to dubious machinations on his part. The very fact that in his leadership position he had been in contact with the Nazi regime was counted against him – a nonsensical accusation.

In fact, when offered an opportunity to leave Germany and settle in America, he refused, saying that he would stay until the last Jew had been saved. Detractors of his memory conveniently forget his heroic stance.

While I was reading the magazine, I was also thinking that so often we look at the past and pretend that if we had been living then we would have known what to do and do it better.

Thus Rabbi Baeck's critics know precisely how he should have talked to the Nazis. Those who speak in these tones usually never experienced the bitter task of living under a regime like that, and having the impossible duty of representing their people to boot.

Rabbi Baeck, whose name is today perpetuated in many institutions and schools, remains for me a nobleman of the first order. I knew him personally as my teacher and will continue to defend his memory.

Tough political choices for Sharon and Arafat

The shocking assassination of Israeli Tourism Minister Rechavam Ze'evi has dramatically altered the Israeli-Palestinian equation in the short term. But although it isn't an easy analogy to stomach, these days, Ariel Sharon and Yasser Arafat have more in common than meets the eye.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Both Sharon and Arafat are caught in a domestic political trap. Sharon is flanked on the left by the Labour party and Minister without Portfolio Dan Meridor, and on the right by extreme voices like National Infrastructure Minister Avigdor Liberman. Sharon knows the international and domestic cost of losing Labour, and has backed off every time Foreign Minister Shimon Peres' resignation threats seem serious.

But Sharon's balancing act is further complicated by Benjamin Netanyahu's appeal to Likud's rank and file who see Sharon, today, as the left's candidate! Netanyahu is poised to challenge Sharon at the first opportunity, and has exploited every indication of weakness to position himself as a better alternative.

Ironically, when Sharon took over as interim leader of Likud after the party's 1999 election defeat under Netanyahu, his stated intention was to keep the leadership seat warm for Netanyahu. Today, Netanyahu is his arch rival within the party. Even in the aftermath of Ze'evi's murder, nothing Sharon can do while preserving his coalition will satisfy Netanyahu or Liberman, whose interests are strictly political and expedient.

Arafat, in turn, is trapped between the more pragmatic wing of Fatah, and the extremist factions like Hamas and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), the latter of which claimed responsibility for the assassination. Throughout the intifadah, he has successfully manoeuvered between, and maintained control among, these groups – whose real battle is for leadership of the Palestinian Authority. Arafat's predicament is further complicated by the radicalization of the Palestinian street, which today is more extreme than some of its leadership.

As a result, in recent months both Sharon and Arafat have believed that they have more to lose than to gain by altering the status quo. Sharon does not want to repeat his Lebanon mistake of 20 years ago, and will not wage all-out war against Arafat. If he does, he will lose the internal consensus for his own war against terror and whatever international support he has. If he resumes talking to Arafat, he will lose his traditional constituency and yield the field to Netanyahu. Arafat has had no interest in talking because he still believes that time is on his side and that he can wear down Israel and engage international support.

Sept. 11 refocused attention on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, but within a dramatically changed international context. To maintain any international credibility, Arafat has to prove that he is part of the war on terrorism – an obvious contradiction in terms. He does not want to repeat his self-defeating strategy of the Gulf War, but he also does not want to seriously rein in the violence. His tentative measures against Ze'evi's assassins are just another case in point. Ironically, by raising the stakes and killing Ze'evi, the PFLP has made Arafat himself a more vulnerable diplomatic and military target – evidence, once again, of the internal battles among Palestinian factions that are waged by killing Israelis.

Sharon, for his part, can resist significant U.S. pressure only so long. Israelis may admire his tough talk, but they have never withstood the threat of American sanctions. In 1957, when the United States and the Soviet Union issued an ultimatum to Israel to withdraw from the Sinai after the 1956 Sinai campaign, David Ben-Gurion conceded only days after he had stated firmly that he would not withdraw. And in 1992, then-prime minister Yitzhak Shamir not only lost $10 billion in U.S. loan guarantees because he refused to freeze settlement construction, but he also lost an election.

Even though such intense pressure now seems less likely, the Americans need to maintain at least the impression of activism and movement to satisfy Arab and Muslim members of the anti-terror coalition. Arafat is feigning restraint but is committed to continued violence. Both leaders will respond to the new international constellation, but neither will do much. Arafat may slightly reduce the volume of terror, and Sharon may eventually lift a few restrictions on Palestinians' movements. If this is the case, a modified status quo may prevail again, even after the assassination, and both Sharon and Arafat will continue their respective domestic balancing acts in the short and perhaps medium terms.

Muslim-Jewish relations and multiculturalism

No Canadians have been more supportive of multiculturalism than Canadian Jews. Jewish organizations were strong early supporters of the Trudeau government's policy initiative when it was introduced in the 1970s.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

As both policy and reality, multiculturalism tries to offer to Canadians of diverse cultural backgrounds two options. The first is the option of maximal participation in Canadian society. The second is the option to retain a particular cultural heritage.

Underpinning the success of multiculturalism is a sense of tolerance and fraternity. The assumption is that Canadians, regardless of their heritage or identity, can find enough common ground to respect other groups and agree on some basic principles. Both Jews and Muslims have been part of this multicultural community for some time.

Today, Muslims in Canada are facing very cruel choices. In some ways all Canadian Muslims, and certainly those from the Middle East, perceive themselves as living in a climate of religious and ethnic McCarthyism. They feel asked to continually prove their loyalty. Any dissent they express regarding any aspects of Canadian foreign policy on the Afghan campaign or terrorism seems to bring them charges of disloyalty.

Of course, Muslims have every right to dissent from Canadian policy. But they have to realize that such dissent, particularly in an atmosphere charged by the threat of terrorism, will place them on the outs with mainstream Canadian opinion.

The current crisis also puts the Jewish commitment to multiculturalism to its toughest test. Defending Israel too strongly will bring forward the dual loyalty canard. And among many Jews, at least some with whom I have spoken, suspect that among Canadians of Muslim and/or Arab backgrounds there are segments that do more than dissent from specifics of Canadian or American policy. Many Jews believe that significant pockets in the Muslim community think America got what it deserved on Sept. 11, and that Bin Laden is a heroic figure worthy of admiration.

While Canadian Muslims generally – and often ritualistically – express their opposition to the Taliban and voice their regret at the loss of 6,000 lives on Sept. 11, many Muslim/Arab leaders in Canada seem quick to change the topic: to the long history of Western colonialism; to Israel's "brutal" occupation of the West Bank; to the original sin of Israel's creation and the sad fact of American support for Israel; to the possibility that the Mossad secretly engineered the attacks; to the backlash against Islamic Canadians; to the "root causes" of the terrorism, such as poverty or globalization; to the American overreaction and to deaths of innocent Afghan civilians during the bombing.

Most distressing to Jews are the attitudes toward Israel. I do not know what Muslim Canadians really think about Israel's existence and about Canadian Jewish support for Israel. And I do not know how Canadian Jews feel about the Muslim communities in their midst. I have not seen any reliable survey data on these subjects.

But it is very likely that most Canadian Jews think that most Islamic/Arab Canadians do not wish Israel well. How much ill is wished for Israel may of course vary. But it is likely that among many – and perhaps most – Muslim/Arab Canadians, whether they be secular, working class, students, (so-called) fundamentalist, or middle class professionals, there is a significant antipathy toward Israel. Some openly yearn for a Middle East without a Jewish State.

This antipathy reinforces, and is reinforced by, antipathy to the United States and the West. But it also stands alone. In its most extreme form, it is often indistinguishable from classic Jew hatred, as was suggested by the recent experience at the UN's so-called anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa. All of this breeds distrust toward Muslims on the part of Canadian Jews.

Because of these reciprocal dynamics, Canadian Jews and Canadian Muslims in large part – there are heroic exceptions – likely regard each other with increasing suspicion, despite the obligatory rhetoric celebrating multiculturalism that is required from all ethnic leaders.

This antipathy is of course understandable, on both sides. But for inter-group relations, and multiculturalism in Canada, it is ultimately lamentable. And things may get worse before they get better.

The Kirshner File

A fine crop of movies from the film festival

The 26th annual Toronto International Film Festival presented cinephiles with an unusually fine crop of movies this year, some of which were of particular interest to Jewish viewers.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Tim Blake Nelson's The Grey Zone is a classic of its genre, a film about the Holocaust that is both authentic and chilling. Expected to open in commercial release next August, it is based on the memoirs of a Hungarian Jewish doctor who assisted the infamous Dr. Josef Mengele in his horrifying medical experiments at Auschwitz.

The Grey Zone turns on a Sonderkommando unit placed in a wrenching moral dilemma on the eve of an armed revolt in October 1944. The Sonderkommandos were charged with pacifying Jewish inmates, expropriating their valuables, herding them into gas chambers, shovelling the corpses into ovens and disposing of their ashes and bones. The teams, composed of Jews, were granted privileges in exchange for their services: decent food and drink, larger quarters and the right to loot. Yet, ultimately, the hard men in the Sonderkommandos were not immune to the fate of their victims. The lifespan of a Sonderkommando did not exceed four months. As one of its members ruefully puts it in the film, "You're dead already here."

Featuring a first-rate cast headed by David Arquette, Steve Buscemi and Harvey Keitel, The Grey Zone takes unadorned realism to new heights. The Bulgarian set doubling as Auschwitz is utterly convincing, down to the smallest detail. The crematoriums, whitish smoke wafting from their chimneys, look terrifyingly real, as do the grim barracks housing the drones of the 12th Sonderkommando, consisting of Hungarian Jews.

In his quest for authenticity, Blake Nelson avoids the trap of sentimentality. The camera pans on the eyes of newly-arrived prisoners, who suspect nothing. As they disembark, an orchestra plays soothing classical music. The facade is picture perfect.

"Cleanliness brings freedom," a Sonderkommando exhorts Jews as they are readied for "showers." Then a gentle reminder: remember the numbered hook you've hung your clothes on. When a hapless Jew refuses to part with his gold watch, he is beaten to a pulp, then shot by a German guard.

Screams fill the air as Zyklon-B gas extinguishes the lives of a batch of Jews. Bodies are shoved unceremoniously into burning incinerators. To the clanging of eerie metallic sounds, the crematoriums do their grisly work. At the end of a hideous shift, the Sonderkommandos sit down at a table groaning with smoked meats, oysters, cakes and bottles of choice alcohol.

When a 14-year-old girl somehow survives a gassing, the Sonderkommandos seize on this as a chance at personal redemption. A compassionate doctor who's normally at Dr. Mengele's beck and call attends to her, a wheezing, catatonic, pathetic form. The Sonderkommandos are under no illusion that their kindness puts them at personal risk and endangers a planned rebellion that could save thousands.

Unreeling with an inevitable sense of doom, The Grey Zone is a powerful and resounding cri de coeur about man's capacity for cruelty. It leaves an immense impact, greater, perhaps, than even Schindler's List.

In Taking Sides, the distinguished Hungarian director Istvan Szabo (Sunshine, Mephisto, Colonel Redl) deals intelligently and rivetingly with a gnawing question that demands an unambiguous answer: What is an artist's responsibility in a totalitarian regime? Does he or she remain, or flee?

With the rise of Adolf Hitler in 1933, Wilhelm Furtwängler, the renowned musical director of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, faced this morally difficult problem. Amid the anti-Semitic campaign launched by the new Germany, Furtwängler, no Nazi himself, allowed himself be co-opted as an unwitting tool in Hitler's arsenal.

Taking Sides, which stars Harvey Keitel and Stellan Skarsgard, opens with a brilliant flourish. In a magnificent concert hall whose lights have been dimmed as a precaution against Allied bombing raids, Furtwängler (Skarsgard) conducts Beethoven's enveloping Ninth Symphony. Within minutes of this establishing shot, the ominous roar of heavy bombers mingles with the symphony's sonorous tones. The hall empties as the bombs fall.

The action then shifts to postwar Berlin. Steve Arnold (Keitel), a major in the U.S. army, is assigned to an American de-Nazification committee. His task is to nail Furtwängler. "We believe he sold himself to the devil," his commanding officer says. "He represents everything rotten in Germany."

Arnold, an insurance adjuster in civilian life, relishes the challenge, though his knowledge of music is nonexistent. But, having seen the horrors of Nazi Germany first-hand, he sets out to investigate Furtwängler, hoping to prosecute him. Indeed, the evidence suggests that he was a Nazi in good standing. He served Hitler faithfully, having been a "flag carrier" of Nazi culture and a Prussian privy counsellor. He played at one of Hitler's birthday parties, and, more incriminatingly, he appeared to be an anti-Semite.

As Arnold relentlessly grills Furtwängler's associates, who consider him a demigod, he discerns shades of grey. Furtwängler, he learns, refused to shake Hitler's hand, and he helped Jewish musicians who had been evicted from the orchestra.

Arnold, having contemptuously referred to his prey as a mere "bandleader," interrogates Furtwängler ruthlessly, trying to humiliate him. Such are his methods that Arnold's assistants, a German secretary (Birgit Minichmayr) and a U.S. lieutenant (Moritz Bleibtrau), rise up in protest.

In his defence, Furtwängler claims that he fought the Nazis from the inside, did not seek honorific titles and did what he could to help Jewish colleagues. He admits that he was politically naive and that he peppered his speech with anti-Semitic references to please officials. But he claims that he loved his country. "What was I to do?" Unimpressed, Arnold lashes out, branding Furtwängler as a coward and a "piece of shit."

The cat-and-mouse game between Arnold and Furtwängler is tantalizingly played out, with Keitel and Skarsgard delivering scintillating performances and with Szabo directing flawlessly. Taking Sides is strong and memorable.

Elida Schogt's poignant short, Silent Song, concentrates on the sad, flickering image of a young Jewish boy playing the accordian after Dachau's liberation by American forces. The footage, taken by a U.S. army cameraman, is the departure point of Schogt's brief examination of the ephemeral nature of the moving image and of life itself. Intriguing.

By turns scabrous and shocking, Henry Bean's The Believer is a foray into the mind and heart of Danny Balint, a self-hating Jew – a former yeshiva student who transforms himself into a hate-spewing professional anti-Semite. Balint is modelled after an American Nazi who committed suicide after The New York Times in 1965 exposed his Jewish identity.

Portrayed exquisitely by Canadian actor Ryan Gosling, Balint is a neo-Nazi skinhead who demonizes Jews, roughs them up at every opportunity and plots to blow up a synagogue. "We hate (Jews) because they exist," he rants. "There's no reason." In fact, he professes to have many reasons for despising Jews.

Balint is not your garden-variety Jew baiter. He is familiar with Jewish texts, possesses a working knowledge of Hebrew and is bright and articulate. No wonder a budding neo-fascist movement wants to recruit him as a speaker. But, as he discovers to his great disappointment, anti-Semitism is not on its platform. "Anti-Semitism is what we trying to leave behind," says Curtis Moebius (Billy Zane), the chief ideologue.

Never less than interesting, The Believer is a searing portrait of a smart, wayward young man who consumes himself in a fireball of malice and hatred.

Nazareth 2000, by Israeli Arab filmmaker Hany Abu-Assad, is a charming small film with disturbing undercurrents. Two middle-aged gas station attendants – a Muslim and a Christian – scramble to adapt to new management techniques, a dress code and a non-smoking policy. But Nazareth 2000, which unfolds against the backdrop of Pope John Paul II's visit to Israel last year, also probes the latent tensions between Muslims and Christians and the simmering grievances of Israeli Arabs.

The Sun Behind the Moon is extremely relevant, focusing on the arduous journey of a Canadian Afghan woman into the heart of Taliban-controlled Afghanistan in a bid to find her maimed sister. In addition, Mohsen Makhmalbaf's visually striking film deals with such issues as Islamic fundamentalism, the position of women and the plight of disabled civilians disfigured by land mines.

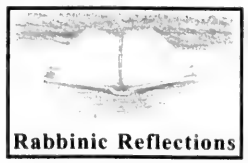
Jewish Life

Did Abraham sell out?

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH



Does everything in life have a price?

Our Torah portion for this week finds Abraham and Sarah facing some "good old-fashioned" family issues, the kind each and every one of us is familiar with. Read the text and see if you can spot a problem.

"There was a famine in the land, and Abram went down to Egypt... and he said to his wife Sarai, 'I know what a beautiful woman you are. If the Egyptians see you, and think, "She is his wife," they will kill me and let you live. Please say that you are my sister, that it may go well with me because of you'... Because of her, it went well with Abram; he acquired sheep, oxen, asses, male and female slaves, she-asses, and camels..."

See a problem yet?

Our forefather Abram (later to become Abraham) doesn't say to his wife Sarai (soon to be renamed Sarah), "Tell them you're my sister so they won't kill me." No, he tells her to lie so that he can make a profit, and that's precisely what happens. Sarai follows through with the plan: although she really says nothing to us, her silence is her answer, and there are many possible answers we could read from her silence.

However, in the end Pharaoh discovers the truth – that Sarai is another man's wife – when he is afflicted with a plague. So Pharaoh sends Abram away with all the money and sheep Abram can carry, with one final word of bewilderment, "Why didn't you tell me she was your wife?"

This is a telling remark, showing that even a Pharaoh couldn't bear the stigma of moral corruption in the eyes of his people.

Yet, I wonder why would Abram allow this to happen? In fact, this behavioural legacy is carried on with Isaac, who does the same thing with his wife Rebecca in Egypt during another famine.

So did Abraham sell out his morality?

Let me say that I believe that Abraham was a tzaddik, a saintly man. But I also believe that no one achieves greatness by being a pushover. So, at times he became aggressive in achieving his goals. But we also know that this is the kind of price we pay for living in a less than perfect world, and Abraham clearly made his errors along the way.

But perhaps there is another interpretation we can gather from this reading. And this is that we look at Abraham and the whole Torah through the prism of our own "weaknesses." We take what seems to be an ambiguous story and read it down – and not up – because this is what we do to everything else we encounter. We look for the negative and fail to see the positive.

In spite of this, I believe the real meaning of the text is unimportant.

I know that Abraham was a man who was worthy of being chosen by God – our nation is living proof of that. So why ask these questions? It is important that we ask and probe into these holy texts because this is the way that we create the awareness that they are of value to our lives as people – as spouses, parents, children and friends. What is important is not that they represent some ancient record of what happened, because in the end, what we see in these people and their problems is what we see in ourselves. And nothing has a greater value than that.

Shabbat shalom.

Rabbi Flanzraich is spiritual leader of Beth Sholom Synagogue in Toronto.

Learning the sad truth about terrorism

By STACEY ORDAN

I was very fortunate to have recently experienced the lesson of a lifetime. I was in Israel on Project Otzma, a 10-month volunteer program for university graduates from Canada and the United States that allows participants to live in different parts of the country while volunteering for communities in need. Project Otzma is an initiative of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Living in Israel this past year forced me to become accustomed to a completely different lifestyle from the one I was used to. My weekends were Friday and Saturday. Sunday was the beginning of the work and school week. On Saturdays everything was closed, including the ATM in the old city of Jerusalem. These changes were all frustrating at first, but the hardest thing I had to get used to took place in September 2000: living with the fear of terrorism.

When I first arrived in Israel, I rode the bus two or three times a day. I would go to the malls without a second thought. This all changed as terrorism became a part of my everyday existence. I became paralyzed with the fear of being on a bus with a bomb on it, or being in the mall at the wrong time. This led me to stay home and only leave when I had to.

I soon realized that by not leaving my house, I was letting the terrorists win. Not because they had detonated another bomb, but because they made me afraid to live in the place where I felt safest in the whole world. I realized I could just as easily be walking in the street or riding in a cab next to a bus that blows up. So, I changed my mindset.

Just as my parents warned me when I was younger not to cross the street without looking both ways, so I instilled in myself what Israeli parents tell their children: "Always be cautious of what and who is around you and pay close attention to suspicious objects."

This is the type of life many Israelis lead, and I praise them for it. I have never met people who are so dedicated and proud of who they are, and rightfully so. They have fought very hard to get to where they are. It is not everyday in North America that you meet people who can live in conditions like this, but in Israel they do. And when disaster strikes, the tragedy is never forgotten, but life always goes on.

On Sept. 11, the United States was hit with possibly the worst terrorist attack in history. The lives that were lost and the courage that was found by survivors and rescue teams will never be forgotten. It is so sad to think of all the lives that have been lost to terror in both the United States and in Israel. But what is even more tragic is that it took a disaster such as Sept. 11 to bring the fear of terrorism to North America.

Our continent finally understands what terrorism can do and how difficult it is to live with it every day. It strikes at any given time and for seemingly no reason at all. We have been given a glimpse of what Israel has had to live with for the past five decades.

Thousands lost family and loved ones in New York and Washington, D.C., just as in Israel there are dinner tables without fathers, desks without students, carriages without babies, and mothers without their children. The losses involved are immense.

Hatred should not be a reason to kill; it should be a reason to talk. Now, as a nation, we must teach future generations to be stronger than we were before, more united rather than more divided, and we need to live our lives as free and loving individuals. And most importantly, we must teach that there is no room in our world for hatred.

Jewish Life

The ancestral legacy

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

We have begun to read the Torah portions that relate the ancestral stories in the book of Genesis. They are wonderful accounts of people, couples, families, siblings, all the individuals that encounter God and forge the first Jewish relationships with covenant. There has been much dialogue in today's world about trying to label these people and their families.

The dialogue ranges from viewing our ancestors as righteous individuals who could do no wrong, to dysfunctional models of spouses and parents. Often, the view of our ancestors will be dictated by what is politically correct that week. Interestingly, the text in all its richness can generate these debates and once again keep a community linked to its contents for even a disagreement can be a rich dialogue.

Yet in all the controversy over labeling our ancestors, there is a subtle commonality that the text presents to us as an unbroken characteristic thread through all the generations. In each case and usually several times over, each of the matriarchs and patriarchs encounter challenges both on the physical and the spiritual levels.

The challenge begins with "lech lecha", the beginning of the discourse between God and Abraham. God instructs Abraham to leave everything familiar behind and venture on a journey that will change him, his family and humanity for all time. The stakes are high, the risk is great but the reward that is promised is equally phenomenal. God promises a future filled with children and a homeland upon which to settle them.

As enticing as God's promise is, people are creatures of habit and the journey must have raised elements of fear within its participants. The challenge has been laid out and Abraham and Sarah proceed into areas unknown. They are following a God they cannot see to a land they do not know into a relationship they cannot even imagine. We often minimize how brave these people were and the strength it took to overcome their fears.

The invitation to partake of this journey is only the beginning of many such invitations to engage in a challenge whose outcome is uncertain.

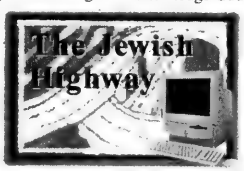
Each generation is invited in and each individual must make their choice accordingly. Isaac and Jacob both marry women from Abraham's original land and consequently each of these people must choose to embark on the journey. Their lives are filled with struggles where they must balance the harshness of life in the ancient world and a growing relationship with a unique Divine Being.

Whether we conclude that every decision they made was correct or productive is a detailed discussion that should not overshadow the tremendous strength shown by these people. No challenge is backed away from and no decision is left open-ended. These are leadership qualities that are rare and should be appreciated.

Genesis Rabbah offers advice to each person learned from the strength of our ancestors: "A man walking on a road saw a pack of dogs and felt afraid of them, so he sat down in their midst."

Grief, Judaism and the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ



It is hard to find the right words when trying to help someone dealing with the loss of a loved one or a community tries to cope with a disaster. But Jewish scholars say the place to look for answers is in our tradition. Today, some insights into grief and consolation from the Internet.

The Mishpacha Web site comments that when someone close to us dies, we lose interest in everyday activities, and sometimes, in life itself. Jewish mourning rituals, it says, both honour the dead and provide a structure for the mourning process. The Web site then explains the stages of mourning (death, burial, shivah, shloshim, the first year and remembrance) and explains that that structure is crucial in aiding the grieving process [http://www.mishpacha.org/deathintro.shtml]. The Web site also has a bulletin board where people have shared their thoughts about loss and grief. You can read their comments or write your own [http://www.mishpacha.org/qdeath.shtml].

Rabbi Naomi Levy, author of To Begin Again: The Journey Toward Comfort, Strength and Faith in Difficult Times, offers this lesson: "There is a beautiful legend that describes God coming to visit Abraham when he is in pain after his circumcision. What is fascinating about this scene is that God goes to all the trouble of visiting Abraham but doesn't cure him. You would think that God, after all, could just repair the wound. But… God simply offers the healing power of comfort, of being by Abraham's side in a time of pain" [http://www.beliefnet.com/story/6/story_608_1.html].

Rabbi Berel Wein suggests that in order to be comforted, we must acknowledge God in the affairs of humans. "Giving insipid and feel good answers to explain God's behaviour and explain or marginalize the Divine Presence in tragedy is demeaning to Jewish tradition and faith. Acceptance of God's will and the appreciation that God need not 'think' or 'behave' according to our finite minds and standards opens the way for closure and consolation" [http://www.torah.org/learning/rabbiwein/5761/vaeschanan.html].

Patricia Fischer's son Gregory was killed in Lebanon in 1982. In her moving article "On Being the Kaddish," she traces her feelings from the day she heard the news and then over the next year and a half. I highly recommend her piece for its insights into loss and mourning – and into healing and living [http://uahc.org/rjmag/301pf.html].

How long after a loss should one still be grieving? Rabbi Earl Grollman, chairman of the National Center for Death Education, was one of the participants in a National Public Radio discussion that examined that subject. Some of the issues brought up in the conversation are mourning the death of a child, how death is portrayed by the media, and the tendency for people tend to compare loss. You can read a transcript of the discussion at the NPR Web site [http://www.npr.org/programs/death/971125.death.html].

Judith Bolton-Fasman says that the just-concluded festival of Sukkot can teach us about dealing with grief. Sukkot "celebrates both the power and fragility of life… On the first Sabbath of Sukkot we read from… Ecclesiastes… The most famous passage of Ecclesiastes [http://www.breslov.com/bible/Ecclesiastes3.htm] proclaims that there is 'a time for being born and a time for dying.' That cycle is celebrated during Sukkot. On… Simchat Torah – we celebrate the cycle of the Torah reading and its stark juxtaposition of passages about life and death. We recount the death of Moses in Deuteronomy and immediately follow it by reading about the creation of the world in Genesis. The message is simple… life goes on" [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/1469.html].

And David Sacks has looked at the most famous phrase of consolation in Judaism, "May God comfort you among the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem." He points out that the Hebrew word used for God's name is Hamakom, literally, "the place." "As much as we think there's a separation between a departed parent and us, or [worse] between God and us, it's not the case. So God consoles us by saying, 'I am 'the place,' so wherever you go and whatever you feel, I am with you'" [http://www.olam.org/magazine/issue4/treasure.cfm?treasure_id=12].

To all those in grief, may you be comforted among the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem.

Future of JIAS Toronto still undecided

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A grassroots group known as the Russian Jewish Initiative (RJI) is fighting to preserve the independence of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Toronto.

Last week, about 65 people – among them JIAS clients, board members and employees, and at least one immigration lawyer – attended a meeting convened by the RJI at the B'nai Brith Canada building to argue passionately against UJA Federation proposals to make JIAS Toronto part of another agency.

"I want to stress that the folding of JIAS' immigration services into another agency is not a fait accompli," Howard English, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's director of communications, told the meeting.

English said a transition committee formed earlier this year by Federation and JIAS Toronto to examine ways of integrating the agency more closely into the federation system is still discussing the issue, and a final decision would be based on administrative and financial efficiency.

But an audience member who identified herself as a JIAS board member contradicted English, saying a merger was "almost a fait accompli."

One option under consideration is merging JIAS with another agency, most likely Jewish Family & Child Services, that also provides services to immigrants.

JIAS – which provides services such as help locating housing or obtaining tuition assistance – is funded jointly by the Jewish community and both the federal and provincial governments, said meeting chair Valentin Simanovsky, a former JIAS board member and former JIAS client.

Jack Kugelmass, JIAS's national director, said if JIAS Toronto were to be folded into another agency, it would not necessarily continue to have a central address with its own staff, executive director, e-mail system and board of directors, although there would continue to be services for immigrants.

Kugelmass said it wouldn't be a catastrophe if JIAS Toronto lost its independent status, but it would be a terrible loss. He said an agency whose sole mandate is to look after immigrants would be more effective than an arm of another organization competing for resources to deal with other issues.

He also wondered whether government funding could be affected if JIAS Toronto were to be merged with another agency.

For example, he noted that JIAS runs a Jewish-oriented language school serving 400 to 500 students a year. "The government gives $450,000 to JIAS to run this school. If JIAS didn't exist or was a different kind of organization, we fear this might be affected."

RJI wants agency to remain separate organization

English was the sole federation staff member to attend the meeting. Others were at a previously scheduled Community Planning and Allocations meeting, English said, adding that he would report back about concerns raised – among them, the future of funding for immigrant services, how potential changes would affect quality of service, and the issue of name recognition, since JIAS' name is known internationally.

He also said that if a delegation would like to meet with federation representatives, "we'd be happy to accept."

Last year in Canada, JIAS welcomed 1,000 Jewish families, representing more than 4,000 men, women and children, Kugelmass said. Of those, 675 families came to Toronto.

Since 1922, when the organization was formed, it has welcomed more than 200,000 Jews to Canada.

Even though many immigrants now arrive with money and resources, Kugelmass said, it's still JIAS' job to welcome them. "That's what we're trying to preserve."

Kugelmass and others mentioned the contributions immigrants make to society once they are established, and the need to foster that. One immigrant after another testified from the audience to the critical difference that JIAS, as a stand-alone agency, made for them.

Currently, JIAS receives hundreds of e-mails per month from prospective immigrants in places like South America, Europe, the United States and even places like Bangladesh, Pakistan and Afghanistan, Kugelmass said.

A letter sent by the RJI executive to friends of JIAS before the meeting emphasized that for new Canadians, JIAS "is the Jewish community."

Book Fair celebrates 25 years

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The people of the book will celebrate the book as the Leah Posluns Theatre hosts the 25th edition of the Jewish Book Fair from Nov. 1-11.

The fair will kick off on Thursday Nov. 1 at 8 p.m. with author Edwin Black discussing his latest book, IBM and the Holocaust. Closing night on Sunday Nov. 11 will feature doctors Steven Stein and Howard Book , co-authors of The EQ Edge Emotional Intelligence and Your Success, who will speak on bringing menschlichkeit (ethical behaviour) into human relationships and the workplace.

In between, book fair organizers have lined up a number of authors to discuss topics to appeal to most readers' tastes.

TVO journalist Steve Paikin, author of The Life The Siren Song of Politics, will discuss Israel and the media at 4 p.m. on Nov. 4 while at 8 p.m. on the 5th, Israeli journalist Tom Segev, author of One Palestine Complete: Jews and Arabs Under the British Mandate, will provide an update on Middle East peace prospects.

Programming for children will be available on Sunday Nov. 4 and on the 11th while school programs under the direction of Eva Wiseman are scheduled for Nov. 6, 7 and 8. Two performances by the students at She'arim Hebrew Day School will also be held at the Leah Posluns Theatre on Nov. 6 and 7.

A tribute to Mordechai Richler is scheduled for Saturday evening Nov. 10, with actors Paul Soles and Marilyn Lightstone and author Allan Gould reading selections from the late writer's works.

And on Sunday Nov. 4, an evening with a Yiddish flavour will help celebrate 25 years of "life and books" at the book fair. The evening's entertainment will feature the klezmer band, Beyond the Pale, along with readings by author Norman Ravvin from his latest book on Canadian Jewish short stories, Not Quite the Mainstream.

Meanwhile, in the theatre lobby, book lovers will have the opportunity to choose from 8,000 books of Jewish interest, said Helen Rudner, director of the fair.

Rudner, who has served as director for the last 21 years, said sales have been brisk in recent years, with an average of 60-65 percent of available copies being sold.

The Jewish Book Fair is a program of the Koffler Centre of the Arts at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, in co-operation with UJA Federation. All book fair programming will be held at the Leah Posluns Theatre, with the exception of the launch of the 10th edition of Parchment, Canada's journal of Jewish creative writing, which will be held at the Miles S. Nadal Jewish Community Centre on Bloor Street on Nov. 11 at 11 a.m.

Alpert was a longtime community leader

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Patricia Alpert, immediate past national president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO and a long time community leader died recently at age 70.

Obituary

Alpert, who joined the organization as a young bride, quickly became actively involved. Among a number of other positions she has been president, vice-president and corresponding secretary of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO.

Her national positions included vice-president; chair, Canadian Hadassah-WIZO Foundation; and chair, council presidents.

She has also held positions in such organizations as State of Israel Bonds, Jewish National Fund, Jewish Women's Federation, B'nai Brith League for Human Rights, Holocaust Centre of Toronto UJA Federation, Baycrest Hospital, Reena Foundation and Canadian Jewish Congress.

Alpert taught for the North York Board of Education for 11 years, and was an artist. As part of her community work, she designed gift cards and a membership campaign brochure for Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, and program books for a number of organizations.

Taube Zeifman, past Toronto president of Hadassah-WIZO, and Alpert's friend for 25 years, said, "Pat excelled in everything she attempted, from her artistic accomplishments, to her work as a teacher, to her role as a community leader.

"As national president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, she was recognized as an outstanding leader both here and in Israel. She guided the organization through three successful years with an open minded and a creative approach to all the challenges she faced," said Zeifman.

Beyond her volunteer life, she said, Alpert distinguished herself as a highly praised and award winning artist. Her work was exhibited at group and solo shows in galleries and museums in Canada and the United States. "She was modest to a fault, but her peers recognized her exceptional talent," said Zeifman.

Alpert was also committed to her family and friends, she said. "She shared passionately in all our joyous occasions and held our hands [with] empathy in sadness.

"Pat was a remarkable woman of impeccable moral integrity...the quintessential mentsch. She always took the high road in pursuit of her goals and taught me by example how to behave with dignity. She was an inspiration to all who knew her and made an indelible mark on our lives."

In a letter written to Alpert when she became ill, Judy Feld Carr and her husband Donald, also friends and community leaders, said that they remember [Alpert] for her strength, graciousness, wonderful sense of humour and her beauty. "We admire you for your increasing commitment to our people."

Alpert is survived by her husband Herbert, daughters Lisa and Nancy, and four grandchildren.

Birthright winter program oversubscribed

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A last-minute surge of Canadian applications for Birthright Israel's winter break program means that the Canada-Israel Experience Centre (CIEC) now has 1,843 applicants for 1,700 spots.

The Oct. 5 application deadline for the free trip was extended until the beginning of November across North America because of the terrorist attacks on the United States. The free trip is available to 18- to 26-year-olds who have never visited Israel on an educational program.

As of Oct 15, there were 810 Toronto applications for the trip, said Adam Minsky, UJA Federations Canada's director, Israel & Overseas Programs and director, National Jewish Campus Services.

"This year, given the exceptional circumstances in the United States and Israel, the beginning was slower, but the typical pattern is that people wait almost until the deadline date," Minsky said. "The last weekend [before the original deadline], I would say I had 400 applications come in that weekend alone."

The countrywide breakdown of applicants is as follows: Atlantic Canada 20; Calgary, 26; Edmonton, 10; Hamilton, 28; Kingston, 57; London, 94; Montreal, 485; Ottawa, 57; Regional communities of Ontario (those without Jewish federations), 74; Saskatchewan, 5; Vancouver, 66; and Winnipeg, 11.

Minsky said he may be able to obtain more spots than the original 1,700 allocated by Birthright Israel organizers. Initial allocations are based on community estimates of how many people will apply.

It's too early to say how the itinerary will be affected by security concerns, Minsky said. "In the Middle East two months is a long time – I can't tell you right now."

Security measures were already increased on previous trips over the past year, in light of the intifadah that began in September 2000.

For further information on Birthright Israel, or to register, the Web site address is www.israelforfree.com.

Lubavitch program to examine Jewish women throughout history

TORONTO — The Jewish woman throughout history will be the theme of a gala evening sponsored by the sisterhood of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham.

The event, called Brides of the Ages, Children of Israel, will be held at the synagogue, 83 Green Lane, in Markham on Nov. 7 at 8 p.m. Part of the proceeds will go to the Shabtai Levi Home in Haifa, which offers residential and emergency care to young children in need.

The feature of the evening is a fashion show called Jewish Brides Through the Ages and Around the World, a production which has travelled all over the world. This is its only Canadian stop on the current tour.

Women and teenage girls from the synagogue will model biblical and historical figures who have contributed to Jewish survival and bolstered Jewish identity through costume and song.

There will also be a Chinese auction, and refreshments, dessert and coffee or tea.

The cost is $25 per person.

For more information, or to reserve, call Chabad of Markham, 905-886-0420.

An elaborate Sephardi bridal gown is part of "Jewish Brides Through the Ages" presentation currently on a world tour.

New regional chair of CCRJ connects two jobs

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jack Kugelmass, the new regional director of outreach for Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ), actively encourages people to make Jewish choices in their lives.

Kugelmass, originally from Montreal, also serves as national director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services. He was JIAS's Toronto director as well before he took over the position at CCRJ from Jessie Caryll, the pioneer of outreach in Canada.

"The two jobs are connected in that they both deal with outsiders – with people on the boundaries of the system," says Kugelmass, who was trained as a social worker at the University of Michigan.

The Reform movement began its outreach program in order to reach people who were otherwise marginal, such as immigrants, interfaith couples, those people considering a return to Judaism, converts and people who just want to learn, says Kugelmass.

"Each Reform congregation in Canada makes an effort to be inclusive. We continue to abide by the mitzvot, but we find ways to include everyone in synagogue life, and help them deal with issues such as raising children in an interfaith family.

"Children are confused when they are raised in a multi-faith home. Our position is that it is important to raise children in one faith. It is better to be steeped in one tradition while maintaining respect for the other."

The Reform movement believes that Jews by choice are like any other Jews, and "we want to be sensitive to their needs, and be inclusive."

Synagogue life, he says, is the centre of Jewish life, and is an important bridge to the Jewish home. "It gives family life deeper meaning. It is the challenge of the synagogue to be inclusive of all groups and find places for them amongst us.

"We do, however, believe in boundaries. We don't include people by lowering our standards; that could be a precursor for chaos."

People need to be educated about Reform standards of Jewish life and "our expectations about the observance of mitzvot. There are limits to how non-Jews can participate.

"Reform rabbis will not, for example, perform interfaith marriages. That would lead to a lowering of our boundaries and to confusion. Jewish survival depends on the observance of mitzvot," says Kugelmass.

Conversion is something that has to be taken very seriously, he says. "A person's status is very important."

People have asked him, he says, how interfaith dating and marriage can be prevented. "It is very difficult to prevent relationships that are based on romance. The only way they can be prevented is to prevent any contact with non-Jews or go back to arranged marriages.

Jack Kugelmass

"The Reform movement recognizes that Jews will interact with non-Jews, so we need to reach out and find ways to bring people into the community rather than reject them. People who are not Jewish can contribute to the life of the Jewish family," he says.

They are not trying to promote interfaith marriages, he stresses. "We are responding to them."

His job, he says, is to be a resource person for Reform synagogues, educators and other professionals. "I will work with rabbis and lay people to help them respond to the needs of their community."

He plans on meeting with outreach people across the country, and attending an annual five-day workshop at Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati in which lay people are trained to be outreach fellows.

Kugelmass, who belongs to Holy Blossom Temple, says he first attended a service because he is interested in Jewish music.

"I began to appreciate how serious Reform takes Judaism, how meaningful prayer is, and how rich their programs are. I also like that it is egalitarian; it respects the role of women."

The Reform movement is very rich in tradition, and it promotes family life, he says.

"Families, however, come in many different configurations; the nuclear family is no longer the norm. We have to address those issues," he says.

CORRECTION

In the article, "Ontario campuses relatively peaceful in post-Sept. 11" (Oct. 18), Josh Shuval was mistakenly identified and quoted in the last two paragraphs as president of the Jewish Students' Association at the University of Waterloo. He is actually the president of the Jewish Students Union at the University of Western Ontario. The CJN regrets the error.

Harris resigns

fordable housing crisis, deduction of the National Child Benefit from non-working families – all challenged our traditions of tzedakah, tikkun olam, and struggles against injustice and discrimination."

"Regardless of who replaces Harris in the coming months, our fight for a kinder and more equitable Ontario has been greatly bolstered by his resignation," she added.

Harris was long a visible presence on the Jewish scene, even before he became premier. He attended Yom Ha'atzmaut rallies and never missed the annual co-operative effort between Queen's Park and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem to honour a select group of Holocaust survivors.

Harris visited Israel twice, once in 1994 as the leader of the third party, and again as premier in 1998, when he met with Israeli government leaders. He would often emotionally remark that he would never forget his visits to the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial.

At a 1997 Toronto dinner to honour Righteous Gentiles (at which members of a Jewish social action group protested), the chair of Yad Vashem, Avner Shalev, presented Harris with a special scroll making the premier an honorary trustee of the institution. Harris was also listed as a board member of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

"Frankly, I'm going to miss him," said Attorney General David Young. "I think he's been a great leader. I got into politics because of Mike Harris."

David Young

Young, Ontario's second consecutive Jewish attorney general, summed up his boss's main achievements: three straight balanced budgets, reduced welfare rolls and Canada's strongest economic growth. "He had the courage and strength to do the right thing," Young said.

Harris's departure "was not unexpected," remarked longtime Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter. "There had been rumours around here for weeks."

Monte Kwinter

Kwinter had genial words for the premier. "Love him or hate him, he was the leader and he kept the factions in line." Kwinter wondered whether Harris's successor will be able to keep moderate Red Tories and more right-wing neo-conservatives from splintering the party.

The Jewish community, by and large, applauds Harris for instituting the private school tax credits. "Many of his initiatives have had an impact. Some worked, some didn't. But for others, we won't see the results for some time," Kwinter said. The Tories' policies in areas like education, the environment and health care, he added, often fell short.

On the other hand, Harris "had a genuine appreciation for Israel."

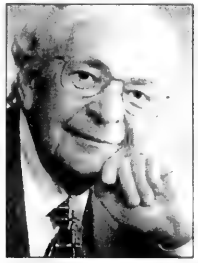
Memoir writer Rabbi Schild will discuss Kristallnacht

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Erwin Schild has no intention of changing his plans to travel to Israel and Germany in the coming month as a result of the terrorist attacks on the United States Sept. 11.



Rabbi Erwin Schild

"We always live with a certain amount of risk," the 81-year-old rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel Congregation said in a recent interview at the synagogue.

A native of Cologne who was imprisoned briefly in Dachau in 1938, Rabbi Schild rejects as specious any comparison of Sept. 11 to Kristallnacht. "It isn't what we went through.

"We were a tiny minority surrounded by a hateful majority that singled us out, whereas here we have the comfort that we are in the same boat. We're all in it together. We support each other."

The rabbi, who will speak about Kristallnacht as part of Holocaust Education Week, was named a member of the Order of Canada this year, an honour he downplays as "not so remarkable." (He was among 104 recipients.)

What is more remarkable is that he entered the country as an enemy alien and spent two years in an internment camp. "The camp commander told me the only way I could stay in Canada would be six feet under the ground."

It should be noted that his Holocaust Education Week address will be held Nov. 7, not Nov. 6 as listed in the program. On Nov. 6, the rabbi, whose memoir, The Very Narrow Bridge, was published earlier this year, will speak at Toronto's Jewish Book Fair.

Last year, Rabbi Schild received an honour comparable to the Order of Canada from the government of Germany, in recognition of his contributions to Jewish-Christian dialogue in that country. He has visited there numerous times since he was first invited in 1982 and will return for another three-week lecture tour next month.

This time, his talks will include more autobiographical material, particularly when he addresses high school students. In the past, he has preferred to focus on Judaism rather than on his own story, he said.

His new book, begun originally as a document for family members, is not available in German, but the German edition of his previous book, World Through My Window, sold more copies than the English version.

Speculating on whether this trip will be different in light of the terrorist attacks in the United States, the rabbi said that now, "all of a sudden, we have to confront the fact that we, the people of the West – and I throw the Jews in with [that group] – are hated by a substantial part of humanity."

The new division lines are "almost a religious demarcation," the rabbi said. Whereas the western world's opponents are defined largely by their Muslim religion, the West is no longer defined by Christianity, he said.

He does not believe Islam is spiteful or hateful from a theological point of view but that it is being used to feed animosity against the West.

Rabbi Schild has spoken publicly about the hatred he once felt for Germany as a result of the Holocaust, in which he lost his parents, other family members and friends. With time, however, his feelings changed and he moved toward rapprochement. He doesn't think he is unique in that respect.

"The problems of anti-Semitism cannot be overcome by hating those who hate us," he said. To overcome hatred, "you need a passage of time after the removal of the cause of hatred… Like all kinds of passions, hatred has to be fed by something."

Students in Kitchener-Waterloo celebrate opening

By LAUREN S. BRESLIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The University of Waterloo-Wilfrid Laurier University Jewish Students' Association (JSA) celebrated the official opening of its new house on Sunday, Sept. 23, with a ceremony in honour of its benefactor, Albert Latner.

Students from the two universities came to express their gratitude to Latner, as well as to kick off the inaugural event of the fall semester. Through speeches and presentations, the ceremony catalogued the development of Waterloo's Jewish community and explained the significance of having a self-contained Jewish student centre, pointing out that a sound Jewish infrastructure helps further the JSA's educational and social efforts.

The house, known as the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Students' Centre of Kitchener-Waterloo, will act as club headquarters for JSA members from both universities.

"This marks an important moment in the development of Jewish campus life," commented Michael Soberman, director of community development for the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (a partnership between Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and UJA Federations Canada). "Local Jewish communities are essential for the well-being of the whole."

The JSA students consider the home to be more than just a space to host bagel brunches and Shabbat dinners; to them, it is a milestone in the local community. Students see their new house as a symbol of permanence and feel that the voice of the JSA is becoming stronger and more resonant.

An affiliate of Hillel, the Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, the JSA, which has a membership of approximately 500, works to preserve and protect Judaic integrity and to encourage students to take an active interest in their heritage. It also works to sustain Jewish identity in students living away from home for the first time, and in many cases, it attempts to cultivate a notion of spirituality in students who come from secular backgrounds.

The organization hosts a wide range of programs from Holocaust education nights to province-wide Chanukah parties, providing students with a place to socialize, carry open discussions and enjoy kosher foods.

"Whenever I go to JSA events, I feel like I'm at home," remarked JSA member Aron Pinto. "There's something very welcoming about being around people with whom you share a similar background and value system."

Rosanne Brown, director of Regional Campus Organizations, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region and a doctoral student at the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE), organized this kickoff event.

The event's speakers were Paul Socken, chair of the dean's advisory committee on Jewish studies at UW, and Barbara Banks, the chair of Canadian Jewish Campus Services. Lynne Woolstencroft, the mayor of Waterloo, also made a brief appearance to show her support. Due to illness, Latner was unable to attend.

Anticipating an influx of Jewish enrolment over the next few years, the JSA of Kitchener-Waterloo will now be able to accommodate students in a community-based establishment.

Lauren Breslin is a member of the JSA in Kitchener-Waterloo.

UJA FEDERATION

No one gift changes more lives.

UJA to Israel: We Are With You!

Since the Palestinian uprising more than a year ago, UJA Federation has been organizing monthly solidarity missions to Israel. One of the most recent missions – involving past UJA Federation Chairs – turned out to be more eventful than expected.

On September 11th, as the mission, chaired by Leo Goldhar, David Goldstein, Dr. Gerry Halbert, and Julia Koschitzky, travelled to the Syrian border, news quickly spread about the horrors unfolding in New York and Washington.

Undeterred, the mission immediately took on an even more determined and urgent tone.

Originally scheduled to conclude on September 14th, the mission was extended because many participants were unable to fly home. Additional visits were quickly arranged so mission members could use the unexpected time to travel even more of the country, meeting with countless thankful citizens.

For many taking part in this mission, it was not their first visit to Israel under difficult circumstances. Some had chaired the annual UJA Federation campaign during other unsettled times, including the Six Day War, the Yom Kippur War, and the war in Lebanon.

"Israel has lived under the dark cloud of terrorism for far too long," said Dr. Halbert, "I knew it was right for us to be there. They need visitors. Their appreciation was quite evident as everyone from cabinet ministers, to taxi drivers, to people on the street, continually thanked us for being there."

Mission participants were briefed on the current situation by several government and military representatives, including IDF Deputy Chief of Staff, Major General Moshe Yaalon. The mission also included a visit to the Mabat missile plant in Yehud; a meeting with Deputy Foreign Minister Rabbi Michael Melchior; a panel discussion with media representatives and a memorial service in Tel Aviv for victims of the recent terror attack on the Dolphinarium disco.

"Like many others on the trip, my friends and children did not think that this was the best time to go on this mission," relates Rabbi Gunther Plaut, the 1970 UJA Chair. "The mission was full, with stops in different parts of the country and important meetings with government officials, journalists, academics, and just plain people. The Israelis were making the best of their current situation. The absence of a tourism industry was all too plain to see. My plea to you would be to visit Israel – the sooner the better," concludes Rabbi Plaut.

Safe and Sound in Israel on Sept. 11

Seventeen Past Chairs of UJA Federation found themselves on a tour bus in Lebanon the morning of September 11th, when suddenly a chorus of cellular phones began to ring.

Most of those calls were coming from loved ones back in Toronto as they watched – on television – the terrors unfolding in New York and Washington.

"We were on the bus, leaving the Syrian border, going to the Lebanese border, when almost everyone's phone started to ring," recalls mission participant David Green, who was accompanied by his father Al, a former UJA Chair. "It's strange, but there I was in Israel feeling totally safe and secure. I called my wife to make sure everyone was okay and to tell her to take the kids out of school – just to be sure. She asked me, 'What about you, are you okay?' I told her, 'here I am at the Syrian border and I'm probably the safest of all.'"

According to past Chair Leo Goldhar, the irony of being safe in Israel while North America was in turmoil did not go unnoticed. "Naturally, my family was concerned for me being in Israel. We felt safer there than anywhere else," says Goldhar. "Still," adds Goldhar, "we all remained calm and focused, and really – despite the fact that we didn't know when we would get out of there – we made the best of the situation."

"The crisis definitely brought us closer together," says Julia Koschitzky, co-chair of the Past Chairs Mission with Goldhar, David Goldstein and Dr. Gerry Halbert. "Actually, I have probably never felt safer then when we were in Metullah (on the Lebanese border), and I hope that this mission will encourage others to go. There can't be a better time to be in Israel," concluded Koschitzky.

Al Green (l), former Chair of UJA Federation Campaign, and his son, David (r), meet with Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert.

For participant Paul Morton, the timing of this mission couldn't have been better. "I've been on seven or eight missions over the years, but this one was definitely the best. It was the combination of being there when tourism is so abysmally low, combined with what happened in New York and Washington," explains Morton. "We couldn't believe it when the news started filtering in about the terrorist attacks," he adds. "When I heard about the first plane hitting the World Trade Centre, I thought it was an accident. Then, I heard about the second one, and we all just kind of sat there – at the Syrian border of all places – in total disbelief."

Morton made good use of his extra, unscheduled days in Israel. "Because we were hung up there longer than expected, I had the opportunity to jog around the countryside. I ran by the Sbarro pizzeria the day it reopened. It was incredible. I stuck my head in the door and it was packed with people. What really was amazing was that at least one-third of the patrons were there the day it was bombed. That illustrates Israel's indomitable spirit as much as anything."

Participant Allan Brown, whose late father-in-law Harold Lederman was a UJA Chair, marveled at the positive outlook of Israelis despite the chaos. "The people we met in Israel were so positive, thankful, and helpful to us," he says.

Coincidentally, members of the UJA mission came upon a group of New Yorkers who had just heard the terrible news. "It was sad because there, while in Israel, we felt safe and secure," says Brown. "But this poor group of people from New York were, of course, very nervous and panicky as they tried to reach their friends and loved ones by telephone."

David Goldstein, a former campaign Chair, sums up the mission's success. "While the events of September 11 monopolized our meetings for the remainder of the mission, we never lost sight of why we were there. Everyone from high ranking leaders to average citizens was grateful for our presence," says Goldstein.

CSU controversy hurting Concordia University's coffers

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — University fund-raising is being affected by the controversy surrounding the radical activities of the Concordia Student Union (CSU) over the past two months, Concordia University's chief development officer says.

Tamas Zsolnay, executive director of Advancement and Alumni Relations, said he is being told by a significant number of donors or prospective donors that they will not give to the university because of the CSU's behaviour or political positions, or they will be delaying their gift until they see what the university administration does about the situation.

"Some say that they are going to cancel their pledge if we do not do something. But after we have had a chance to speak to them, they usually change their mind, or at least defer rather than cancel," he said. "Most say they are willing to give us a second chance, but they will be watching."

Zsolnay said he can't be certain the concern is greater among Jews, "but anecdotally we have heard more from the Jewish community."

He said his office is trying to reassure supporters that the CSU and its positions are independent of the university and that the administration, under the leadership of Rector Frederick Lowy, has been doing all it can to see that the CSU and its executive abide by both the university's bylaws and the provincial legal framework within which the union operates.

The university's annual campaign was to have been launched toward the end of October but will be delayed "to provide time for the turmoil to settle."

Zsolnay insists, however, that the bottom line does not yet show any significant drop in giving by major donors.

The extensive and, what he terms sensationalistic and sometimes inaccurate, media coverage the CSU has received, especially since September with its publication of the student handbook, Uprising 2001-2002, did not come at an auspicious time for his department. The tome was denounced by B'nai Brith Canada as an "aggressive, pro-Palestinian propaganda tool" that amounted to a "call to arms" because of its glorification of the intifadah, and by others for the anti-establishment directives and suggestive violence.

Not only is the annual $3-million campaign about to get under way, but Concordia is in the midst of collecting the $77 million in pledges it received in its capital campaign.

Concordia is on the eve of a major long-term construction and renovation project, whose total bill is set at $350 million. Concordia has traditionally enjoyed strong financial support from the Jewish community, and Jewish individuals represent a majority of the chairs of the building fund campaign, among them Jonathan Wener, Mel Hoppenheim, Leonard Ellen and Ned Goodman.

"A lot of the people who call in want to express concern or outrage and threaten to stop giving if the situation is not brought under control. I think their concerns are legitimate, and their reaction understandable," said Zsolnay.

"Those who do initially wish to cancel their pledges usually agree to hold off once they have heard the full story, and not just the over-dramatized media version."

Zsolnay said he was particularly disturbed by certain media reporting a rumour that Palestinian students at Concordia were seen dancing on the day of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. "The fact was that these were students of no particular origin who were partying on the corner of Guy and de Maisonneuve at the beginning of the school year. They had likely not even heard yet of what happened in the U.S."

Zsolnay hopes that the Quebec government will uphold the university's position that the CSU is "a separate legal entity, [and Concordia] is relatively powerless to intervene in its affairs."

Earlier this month, the university asked the Inspecteur général des institutions financières and the ministries of education and justice to investigate whether the actions of the present CSU leadership contravene the legal mandate of the CSU.

Education Minister François Legault's initial reaction was that his ministry would not intervene.

The CSU was officially incorporated in 1982 as a separate entity from the university, and its current accreditation authorizes it to act as the legal representative of and to control dues collected from all Concordia undergraduate students.

"The CSU has defended political positions and proposed illegal actions that do not reflect the opinions of the majority of the student body," the administration said in a statement. "The university is very concerned with the statements, language and the incitement to commit illegal acts put forward in the CSU-produced handbook titled Uprising 2001-2002."

While deploring much of the handbook's contents, Lowy has maintained the position that the CSU is "an independent and wholly autonomous corporation accredited under provincial legislation," and, as a result, is legally separate from the university, which has no authority for its activities.

Lowy called many of the statements in the handbook "inflammatory and possibly libellous" in its comments about the university, its officials and some companies that employ its graduates and support it.

"The university disclaims all responsibility for this publication, dissociates itself from its content, and will take appropriate action where necessary. The publication sends a message that certainly does not represent the views of the university or those of many students. The CSU alone bears full legal and moral responsibility for the contents of the handbook," Lowy stated.

Ritter says goodbye CIC; hello Newfoundland

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — After 13 years as executive director of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), Rob Ritter has submitted his resignation and is moving on, both professionally and geographically.

Ritter will be heading to St. John's, Nfld., to become executive director of the Newfoundland and Labrador Medical Association. He said he is finishing up some projects with the CIC and expects to leave for his new post in mid-November.

Rob Ritter

"Health care is going to be an important and dominant issue for Canada well into the decade ahead," he said. "I am enthusiastic about the opportunity to play an active role in addressing the coming challenges."

A background in health policy, combined with the desire to make a major lifestyle change, convinced Ritter that the offer in Newfoundland was too good to refuse.

"I am at a point in my life where I need to make some choices," said Ritter, 52. "I want to try some new things before I wind things down."

Ritter said he and his wife visited Newfoundland about four years ago, and "were truly seduced by the land and by the people, both of which are remarkable... and the opportunity to experience this new cultural adventure is tremendously exciting to us."

He said he did not take the decision lightly, since he has enjoyed both professional success and warm personal contacts at the CIC.

"You become very close with your colleagues, almost like family, which is how I feel. It is certainly not easy to say goodbye."

In an interview with The CJN, Ritter reflected on his accomplishments at the CIC.

"One of the major focuses of an organization like CIC is to be able and ready to defend Israel in the international arena and to make sure that Canadians in particular understand Israel's situation," he said.

"From my side of it, I tried to bring about a change in the mindset of the organization. I wanted very much to move with a proactive agenda...with such efforts as the free-trade agreement between our two countries.

"I also feel we have been able to establish a good climate of co-operation and cohesiveness in our Jewish community."

Ritter said he enjoyed working with several ambassadors over the years and that he was honoured "to have had the opportunity to work with so many senior political figures in both countries."

Israel's ambassador to Canada, Haim Divon, praised Ritter for his dedication.

"The State of Israel is indebted to Robert Ritter for the immense contribution he has made towards furthering Canada-Israel relations.," Divon said.

"During his tenure as executive director of the Canada-Israel Committee, many goals – such as the drafting and implementation of the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement, enhancing relations with the Canadian government and elected officials, arranging numerous parliamentarian exchanges, and improving Israel's image with the media – were achieved.

"His presence in Ottawa will be sorely missed both by Israelis and Canadians that have worked with him."

CIC National Chairman Joe Wilder said Ritter was particularly good at intra-community relations.

"The CIC is predicated on maintaining relations between all of the organizations in the Jewish community that are represented on it, and he was very good at making sure that everyone was on the same page," Wilder said.

Commonwealth Jewish Council meets for biennial conference

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Delegates from around the world met recently in Montreal and Ottawa for the Commonwealth Jewish Council biennial conference.

The Commonwealth Jewish Council and Trust, established in 1982, is comprised of representatives of 37 Jewish communities, with Hong Kong having observer status. Headquartered in London, England, the council provides links between Commonwealth Jewish communities, and helps those communities to preserve their religious and cultural heritage.

Following the opening weekend in Montreal, delegates arrived in Ottawa on Sunday, Oct. 14 where they joined members of the community at a concert sponsored by the Embassy of Israel, the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation and the Vered Israel Cultural and Education Program. The Silver-Garburg Piano Duo – Gil Garburg and wife Sivan Silver – performed three works, including one which had been written for them as a wedding gift by the Israeli composer Sergiu Natra.

The concert, billed as a program of "Solidarity with Israel," was attended by over 450 people.

"By you being here," Israel's ambassador to Canada, Haim Divon, said, "all of us, we are not going to be intimidated and we are not going to cave in. This is our way of expressing solidarity – not through rowdy demonstrations, but through music. This is our way and we shall continue that way.

"With your permission," Divon added, "I would like to dedicate this concert to the well-being of the brave soldiers – American, British and Canadian – who, at this very moment, are risking their lives in order to enable us to continue to attend concerts and to live our lives."

Deliberations continued throughout the day on Monday on Parliament Hill. Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, welcomed to Canada the delegates from such countries as New Zealand, South Africa, Zambia, Barbados and India.

Following a panel discussion on The Campaign to Delegitimize Israel: Challenges and Responses, a luncheon was held with Liberal MP Irwin Cotler as keynote speaker.

The events of Sept. 11 overshadowed the Durban conference, said Cotler, but in many ways, the Durban conference foreshadowed Sept. 11.

"A conference against racism was turned into a conference of racism against Israel," he said, citing many examples of how the proceedings were aimed directly and specifically against Israel. In particular, he pointed out, the NGO (non-governmental organizations) forum was a "cacophony of hate – every discussion, every pulpit, every expression was underpinned by this cacophony of hate."

Cotler said the hope for the future lies in Jewish youth. He praised university students' efforts but added that the organized Jewish community must provide more support and education for them in order to make them feel comfortable defending Israel and being Jewish.

"We have to stand up and be count-

Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray honoured

OTTAWA — Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray was honoured at a recent dinner on Parliament Hill amidst the commotion caused by an anthrax scare.

While emergency response teams dealt with two possible cases of anthrax throughout the afternoon of Oct. 15, the organizers of the Commonwealth Jewish Council biennial conference hastily regrouped and moved its evening banquet from the House of Commons to the nearby Delta Hotel.

Though Prime Minister Jean Chrétien was unable to attend the dinner hosted by Marsha and Edward Bronfman of Toronto, many other members of parliament, senators and diplomats joined the delegates and Jewish community leaders in attendance, including Canadian Alliance leader, Stockwell Day and Alliance House leader, John Reynolds; Lt.-Gov. of Nova Scotia, Myra Freeman; and high commissioners from South Africa, New Zealand and Sri Lanka.

Emergency response teams deal with anthrax scare

Lord Greville Janner, the council's president, referred to the scare in his welcoming address, remarking that the move of such a carefully planned event into a new venue in record time was "a triumph unknown in the world of catering."

In her introduction of Gray, Senator Sheila Finestone added, "If this is the worst that ever happens to us, we can say, 'Thank God.'"

Gray, she said, "has earned the trust, the love and the affection of all sides of the House."

Gray addressed the delegates with a quote from Pirkei Avot (Ethics of Our Fathers): "'Which is the right path a person should choose for himself? Whatever is a credit to himself and earns him the esteem of his fellow men.'"

He quoted Rabbi Shimon ben Gamliel, saying, The world endures on three things: justice, truth and peace and adding that, "today, more than ever, we must strive for these three things, together with people around the world."

Gray praised Council members for their concern for their communities and spoke of his gratification for being recognized for his own public service.

"I have always believed that public service should be looked upon as one of the highest callings of society," he said.

Conference co-chairs were Nancy Cummings Gold and Marc Gold of Montreal. Administrators were Jody Goodman, from Canada, and Maureen Gold and Jo Silverman, from the council's headquarters in London, England. A local Ottawa organizing committee was headed by Carol Greenberg. The council's next conference is to be held in London in two years.

Barak accuses Arafat of encouraging terrorism

Arafat should also halt terror activity among his own people, including the Palestinian security services, and end the incitement against Israel disseminated by Palestinian television, radio and newspapers, Barak stated.

Although the Camp David peace talks ended in failure 15 months ago, Barak said the "calculated risk" of offering unprecedent concessions to the Palestinians served to "unmask" Arafat as a man not ready to make "the painful decisions" for peace that Israel was.

"We found that Arafat is not ready to recognize the Jewish people, just [their] religion, nor their moral right to have their homeland in the State of Israel," he said.

Israelis, he said, are more united than ever because they now know they are not dealing with a "Palestinian [Anwar] Sadat or King Hussein," but rather "fighting the forces of evil."

Barak, who was defeated by Ariel Sharon in the vote for prime minister last February, spoke to almost 1,500 people at Congregation Beth Israel-Beth Aaron, under the sponsorship of the Mike Dym Memorial Lecture.

He said he believed the continuing Israeli-Palestinian conflict had little to do with the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on the United States.

"Israel is not high on the priorities of Osama bin Laden," he said. "First, radical Islam wants to destroy the western way of life."

As well, he continued, "Radical Islam did not attack the United States for its support of Israel, but the other way round: Israel is hated because it represents an outpost of western values... It is ridiculous to argue that Israel is the cause of what happened Sept. 11."

Barak expressed full confidence in the commitment and ability of U.S. President George W. Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair to defeat global terrorism. But he believes this war may take 10 years or more. He warned against any flagging of resolve by the coalition, even though victory may be far off.

"The choice for the [free world] is to destroy or be destroyed... Nothing short of unconditional surrender will suffice. Otherwise, no world order is possible."

Barak said it will not be an easy campaign. "It will have its ups and downs; many innocent civilians will lose their lives... It will be a bloody business."

It should be assumed, he said, that the terrorists will strike a second and possibly third major blow against the West. He called on the free world to be "unflinching" in its will to fight terrorism to the end by all means: military, diplomatic, economic and through the sharing of intelligence.

There should be no "double standard" when it comes to defining terrorism, he said. "There is not 'bad' terrorism when it hits Manhattan, and 'good' terrorism when it hits Israel's discos and restaurants," he said.

He said it should be remembered that the 200 Israelis killed by terrorism in the past year is, in terms of population, proportionally the equivalent of 9,000 Americans.

Barak also took exception to those who try to draw a "moral equivalence" between terrorism against Israeli civilians for political objectives and Israel's "pre-emptive" killings of individuals who have perpetrated or are planning terrorist acts. The latter he described as self-defence.

"Do you think the United States would not have taken steps if it knew in advance its [World Trade Center] towers would be exploded?" he asked.

In response to a question about whether Israel is concerned about being "sold out" by the United States in order to keep the Muslim countries in the coalition, Barak said, "We are strong enough to stand on our own."

However, he added that Sharon's comparison to the fate of Czechoslovakia on the eve of World War II was not "accurate."

"We, as Jews, should be very careful not to draw examples from that period. We have made a point not to draw equivalence between the Holocaust and anything else, because we want that imprint left on the memory of the world like the mark of Cain."

Barak was warmly introduced by Rabbi Reuben Poupko, well-known for his conservative view of the peace process, as "representing the best of the Jewish people and the State of Israel."

Describing Barak as Israel's most decorated soldier and a man who puts principles above politics, Poupko noted: "[Barak] risked his political career so the children of Israel would have a better future. He took risks on the battlefield and at the negotiating table. He deserves our eternal gratitude and respect."

White powder is mailed to Jewish groups

Len Rudner, community relations director for Canadian Jewish Congress, said a UIA staffer opened an envelope and found a white, granular substance. Police were contacted and access to the office was restricted. Fire department and emergency services also responded and the letters were removed for analysis. Unlike precautions taken in Montreal, Toronto police told building staff they could remain at work. Staff were instructed that if they felt ill in the next few days, they should visit their doctors and be tested for anthrax, Rudner said.

Rudner declined to name the UIA staffer who opened the mail, saying only that "the person is angry and annoyed. Everyone in this building is doing work on behalf of the Jewish community. This level of harassment is unconscionable.

"It is clearly an act against the Jewish community."

Meanwhile, at the headquarters of Na'amat Toronto, executive director Lorraine Levene said she opened the letter to find it contained a white powder that spilled onto her hands. After washing up, Levene contacted police who immediately ordered the evacuation of the building. After about one hour, she and her staff were allowed back to work.

"I felt anger at what our society is coming to, that we sit here in a country that is supposedly safe and these things are happening even in Canada," she said.

One of the letters included a short note describing the lethality of the anthrax bacteria. The rest of its message was even more ominous. It went on to say:

"Jews everywhere will learn about this and other things. The great Jihad is beginning and in its end we will destroy the Jewish satan and all his servants throughout the world. Islam is coming. Just as you have invaded and occupied the lands of Islam, we have also invaded Europe and North America. We are everywhere and you are powerless to stop us.

"We will bring you misery and death, not only in occupied Palestine but also New York, Frankfurt, London, Toronto, Los Angeles, Paris, Madrid, everywhere you once felt safe.

"We do not want to negotiate or to be appeased or to reconcile. We want to watch you die. This is our global goal and even your mighty armies and wealthy banks will not turn the tide."

At the Bloor JCC, executive-director Bill Emery said something about the letter raised his suspicions and he put it aside rather than open it. When later informed about the anthrax scare, he alerted police, who arrived quickly and removed the letter.

Congress immediately sent out a bulletin to Jewish organizations across the country warning them to to be alert to letters matching the description of the ones received in Toronto and Montreal.

Winnipeg businessman trying to build garment factory in Jordan

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Businessman Stephen Freed believes that trade and commerce are the key to peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

To that end, the longtime Winnipeg garment manufacturer (Freed and Freed International) has been trying for the last six years to develop a business, first in Gaza, and now in Jordan. The bureaucrats in Israel and the Palestinian Authority spoiled his efforts in Gaza, he says.

Those efforts began in 1995 when Freed took a sabbatical from his business and took his family to Israel for a year. It was his and his family's first time in Israel and they loved it. They rented a home in Herzlia Petuah and arranged schooling for the three Freed children.

"It was a very exciting place to live," Freed says. "We really enjoyed the lifestyle."

While in Israel, Freed became involved in building a condominium project in Kiryat Chaim near Haifa. He also learned through a Canadian commercial attache that the Canadian Embassy was looking for people to generate some commerce between Canada and Gaza.

"I went to Gaza with a consultant to look into a joint venture," he says. "Canada and Israel had recently signed a free trade agreement which included Gaza. Labour costs were significantly lower in Gaza. And the major commerce between Israel and Gaza was in clothing."

Freed's first hurdle was finding a Palestinian partner. Although he met many people, none were suitable. There was also the problem that bank financing as we know it doesn't exist in Gaza.

Freed was finally put in touch with a Palestinian consultant whose family heads the Bank of Palestine. He was also introduced to an individual who could help coordinate the project "for a small fee."

Freed worked out a system whereby he would provide the raw materials to Gazan workers who would make coats for export. After three years of effort, he received his first and last shipment.

"The quality was fine," he says, "but politics made it impossible to continue."

Under the Canada-Israel free trade agreement, he was supposed to be reimbursed by Israel for the duty he was charged to bring in the raw materials. It didn't happen.

Then the Palestinians slapped an export tax on the finished product.

The two factors increased expenses to the point where the project was no longer feasible.

"A number of businesspeople with whom I spoke have found the areas under Palestinian rule to be a very difficult environment for doing business," he says. "The taxes are exorbitant."

Freed is still working with the same Palestinian family, as well as with an Israeli partner, to build a garment plant in Jordan. The partners have received some funding from CIDA (the Canadian International Development Agency) to conduct a feasibility study.

If the project goes ahead, Freed's role would be to offer technical and marketing advice. He notes that there are already a large number of Israeli manufacturers who have opened plants in Jordan and that there is a great deal of commerce between Israel and Jordan. In fact, Jordan uses the port of Haifa to ship products in and out, he says.

Montreal election offers lesson

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Nic Discepola is an affable MP from Montreal's West Island. He comes to federal politics through a long stint in the municipal fray and he'll tell you that no level of government is tougher or more volatile than the municipal political arena. Other municipal vets who made the transition from local to national levels, like Elsie Wayne, would likely agree.

So perhaps one can take some comfort in an encouraging development within the current municipal election campaign in Montreal and hope that the Jewish community begins to approach all levels of politics with the strategic thinking evident on that Island city.

The most explosive issue that has emerged in the campaign concerns the issue of Montreal: the mega city. Like Ontario, La Belle Province succumbed to the seductive illusion that bigger is better, and more importantly, bigger is cheaper. So throughout the province, towns, villages and established suburban cities were consolidated into regional behemoths.

Nowhere was resistance to this plan more pronounced than on the Island of Montreal where each former municipality had developed a unique character and identity.

Thus we turn to this campaign, wherein the incumbent mayor, Pierre Bourque, and his well-established team (he's going for a Drapeau-like third term) are declaring that the merger is a done deal and it is time to move on to other things. His chief contender is Gerald Tremblay who is closely aligned with the forces committed to challenging the forced merger all the way to the Supreme Court.

The Jewish dimension surfaces when we consider that prominent city counsellor and Orthodox Jew, Saulie Zajdel, is a key Bourque protégé, and Robert Libman, the much- liked and admired young mayor of Jewish Cote St. Luc is one of the star candidates running on the Tremblay ticket.

What to do? Support Bourque (as most Montreal Jews are naturally inclined to do) and Libman, a potent and effective voice for Anglo and Jewish rights may be sacrificed. But if Zajdel cannot deliver the Jews, will he retain the same influence in a Bourque administration?

It seems that with the wisdom of Solomon, the Jews of Montreal are hedging their bets. It may not be the result of conscious design, but while a comfortable majority of the community has declared for Bourque, a significant number are lining up behind Tremblay and his slate. Ultimately, whether by design or inherent maturity, the development reflects a savvy assessment of the campaign situation. It's an example the overall Jewish community would do well to emulate.

Paris Jews fear for safety after attacks

By ANDREW DIAMOND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

To stroll through parts of the 19th and 20th districts of Paris on a Friday evening or a Saturday afternoon is to encounter a thriving Jewish community.

Comment

Since the beginning of September, however, insecurity and mistrust have disrupted the Sabbath tranquillity for members of this predominantly Sephardi Jewish community.

During the High Holy Days, the Paris police dispatched heavily armed detachments to guard synagogues throughout the city. The vigilance reflects the heightened fear since the Sept. 11 terror attacks in the United States and the threat of renewed violence to mark the one-year anniversary of the Palestinian intifadah.

There also were other reasons, closer to home, to fear an attack.

On the first Sunday of September, a group of 50 or 60 Arab youths attacked Jewish teenagers and tourists on the Champs Elysées. Shouts of "Death to the Jews" and "Heil Hitler" filled the air, according to witnesses, as the assailants hurled bottles and stones at the Jews.

Fortunately, a unit of crowd control police arrived in time to prevent a clash between hundreds of Jewish and Arab teenagers.

Jewish youths involved in the incident claimed the Arab teens had instigated a fight by groping Jewish girls.

Za'ava, a student in the northeast of Paris, suggested the attack had been coordinated by Arab youths from the suburbs.

"They knew that we always go there on that day," she claimed, "and they came to start a fight."

The following Sunday, a group of Arab youths attacked the crowded terrace of a kosher restaurant in the 19th district.

At 6 p.m., as the youthful clientele of Papy Youda sipped drinks on a sidewalk lined with Jewish businesses, an Arab youth took a chair and slammed it into the restaurant's door and windows. His partner used a wrench to hit several cars that were double-parked in front of the café.

This was hardly the first time Jewish businesses on the street had been vandalized, but most of the previous incidents had occurred anonymously, at night.

Such direct confrontations do not bode well for Jews in the 19th and 20th districts, who for several decades have shared their neighbourhoods with Maghrebins, the French term for Arabs of Algerian, Moroccan and Tunisian descent.

Both Jews and Muslims from the former French colonies poured into these low-income areas from the late 1950s through the early 1970s after the North African wars of independence. Immigrants and their French-born children still constitute a large proportion of residents here.

While relations between Jews and Arabs of North African origin have been strained in the past, anti-Semitic incidents have sharply escalated in the past year.

Many fear that the latest hostilities could signal a return to the tense situation of last October, when a wave of arson and graffiti attacks against Jewish synagogues struck Paris and its suburbs.

Rabbi Sitruk

Since then, leaders of the Jewish community have been criticized for not speaking out strongly enough against such violence – or against a French government that has been unwilling to punish the perpetrators and a French press that has been reluctant to report on the incidents.

France's chief rabbi, Joseph Sitruk, responded to such complaints by focusing a meeting with Prime Minister Lionel Jospin last July on the more than 1,000 anti-Semitic attacks that had been recorded since October 2000.

"The way in which the events are reported has an influence on public opinion that is consequently negative toward the Jewish community," Rabbi Sitruk told Jospin.

After the latest episode on the Champs Elysées, Jews called a radio show to express their outrage that no arrests had been made and that the only newspaper to cover the situation, Le Parisien, portrayed it as a brawl between youths rather than as an anti-Semitic attack.

Thus far, however, leaders of Jewish organizations in France have remained silent about the affair.

Their reticence may indicate the continuation of a policy by Jewish leaders and French government officials of portraying such incidents as the acts of "disaffected Arab youths" rather than as a reflection of the larger Arab community. Given the youth involvement in the desecration of synagogues and the more recent physical attacks, this may not be an unreasonable approach.

Many fear that publicity would only embolden the young men who carry out anti-Jewish aggression. Many of these youths have seized upon the Palestinian cause to attain a sense of personal honour in North African communities beset by high unemployment and school dropout rates.

The danger is that, beneath the community's veil of silence, feelings of anger and fear grow among Jewish youths who encounter their Arab neighbours each day.

Reflecting on relations between Jews and Arabs in the 19th district, Sephardi teens gathered in the Buttes Chaumont park after one recent Shabbat articulated a militant but defensive posture.

"The Arabs in France are like the Arabs in Palestine, but we are not afraid," said Yossi, 18, displaying the button of a Zionist youth group on the lapel of his shirt.

His friend Mikael proudly explained how they had joined the French chapter of Betar, a worldwide Jewish youth organization, to protect the community here against terrorism.

But others in the park seemed less assured. Sabrina, 16, said her parents talked of moving to another part of Paris because their current neighbourhood was too dangerous.

Another girl said her parents wanted to move to Israel, where they would feel safer.

Such sentiments suggest that Jews in Paris are bracing for the worst. Yet there are preliminary indications that the Sept. 11 terror attacks actually may have caused aggression against Jews in France to decrease.

In the five weeks since the attacks, only a few minor acts of vandalism against synagogues have been reported. Moreover, the French paper Libération recently reported a drop in both delinquency and religious activity in the weeks after Sept. 11.

This represents a departure from the period of the 1991 Persian Gulf War and the months after the intifadah began, when mosque attendance, delinquency and anti-Semitic violence rose rapidly.

There may be some hope, then, that the latest calls for holy war will not be heeded in Paris. Either way, the young will be first to know.

British Jews skeptical of anti-terror proposal

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — British Jews are welcoming proposed new anti-terrorism legislation, but warn that it must be backed with action.

The government has announced new legislation designed to make it harder for terrorists to operate in the United Kingdom, including attempts to combat money laundering and measures to ease the expulsion of people suspected of having criminal links.

Jews have been particularly pleased that the proposed Emergency Anti-Terrorism Bill, which comes in the wake of the Sept. 11 terror attacks in the United States, tightens laws against incitement to include religious hatred as well.

It also would criminalize incitement to commit terrorist acts against groups or individuals abroad. The Community Security Trust, an organization dedicated to Jewish security issues, praised the principles behind the bill.

"We would welcome stronger legislation that gets to the heart of terrorism planned in this country," a spokesperson for the trust told JTA. But "there has to be political will to prosecute for incitement."

The Board of Deputies, the umbrella organization that represents most British Jews, echoed the trust's analysis.

"We can welcome in principle new powers to outlaw incitement to religious hatred," Neville Nagler, the director general of the board, said. "But the existing powers to prevent incitement to racial hatred have clearly proved ineffective. There has been a lack of will to initiate prosecutions, even in cases where there is clear evidence of the organized distribution of leaflets calling for the killing of Jews.

"If they are to have any value, new powers to deal with religious incitement will have to overcome the clear deficiencies of the existing laws against racial incitement," Nagler said.

Jews are protected under existing hate laws because British law considers them a visibly identifiable race.

The only other religious adherents covered by current legislation are Sikhs, who are considered recognizable by their turbans and beards.

Criminologist Paul Iganski of the University of Essex said only 41 cases of incitement were prosecuted under existing legislation between 1990 and 1997.

Under current laws, he explained, the attorney general must approve prosecutions "in order to avoid political prosecutions."

Historically, there has been a "reluctance" on the part of the attorney general to push cases forward, Iganski said. For the state to prosecute someone for incitement, he noted, "the words must be pretty strong."

Offensive language not closely linked to violence falls outside existing law, said Iganski, the editor of a forthcoming book on making hate a crime.

The Board of Deputies has pushed for Holocaust denial to be covered under existing incitement legislation, for example, but the government has refused because it says such speech is not directly linked to violence, Iganski said.

As a result, existing laws "have hardly been used because you rarely catch speech that is severely insulting," he added.

Iganski also said he objects to the emergency bill on civil liberties grounds.

"Trying to criminalize expression has a potentially chilling effect," he said. "Even if the new laws were framed in the same way as the racial hatred laws, because of how the new laws are perceived, it's likely to have a chilling effect" on free speech.

Possible bin Laden link to Buenos Aires bombings

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BUENOS AIRES — Investigators in Argentina are looking into the possibility that Saudi dissident Osama bin Laden masterminded the 1992 attack on the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aries, and the attack on the Jewish community centre in the Argentinian capital two years later. Some 115 people were killed in the attacks, and 200 others injured.

The main suspect behind the attacks until now has been head of Hezbollah's special operations, Imad Mugniyeh, and other operatives from Iranian intelligence organizations. The new lead in the investigation came from an Argentinian diplomat who served in his country's embassy in the Saudi capital.

The diplomat, Juan José Echeguan, was the Argentinian economic attaché in Riyadh. In an interview with an Argentinian radio station last week, he said the embassy in Riyadh received several anonymous phone calls during September 2000.

The callers said they spoke in the name of al Qaeda, bin Laden's organization, and warned of future attacks, though they did not give an exact location.

During the calls, one of the callers said in Arabic, "We claim responsibility for the bombing in Argentina, and warn that America will receive a surprise on Tuesday, Sept. 28." A later warning changed that date to Sept. 26, when a dinghy armed with explosives slammed into the U.S.S. Cole, anchored in a port in Yemen.

A spokesman for the Argentinian Foreign Ministry said the warnings had been passed on to the American Embassy in Riyadh, which took the necessary steps. The spokesman did not, however, say what these steps were.

Navy chief warns of Egyptian threat

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The buildup of Egyptian naval forces is a cause for concern, the commander-in-chief of Israel's Navy, Maj.-Gen. Yedidia Ya'ari, said last week.

Ha'aretz recently reported about Israel's attempts to prevent a large U.S.-Egyptian arms deal, with the Americans planning to sell Egypt advanced Harpoon missiles, which are fired from a sea vessel and have the capability of hitting land targets with great precision.

The balance of naval power in the Middle East "has changed over the past 20 years, since the Yom Kippur War, and has changed primarily because of the strengthening of the Egyptian navy with American weapons," Ya'ari told a press conference to mark Navy Day. "We are worried about this."

Commenting that "some of the deals could change the balance of power in the area," the naval commander said: "This is why we are expressing our concern. What will the Americans do about this in the long run? We don't know."

Despite the peace treaty with Egypt, the Israel Defense Force views the Egyptian arms buildup, particularly in the navy, with apprehension. A few weeks ago, Israel's Defense Ministry sent a memo to the U.S. State Department warning that advanced arms sales to Egypt could put an end to Israel's strategic advantage.

At the same time, however, Ya'ari noted that Israel's navy had vastly improved its operational level over the past few years.

Despite some media views, assassination not justifiable

The assassination of Israeli Tourism Minister Rechavam Ze'evi on Oct. 17 by the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) sent shock waves through Israel and beyond.

A trend emerged among some media outlets, one that focused primarily on Ze'evi's very controversial political views (especially his often offensive characterization of Palestinians and his advocating of their "voluntary transfer" from the West Bank and Gaza) – the implication being that these views somehow made his assassination justifiable. On the Canadian scene, this emphasis was most apparent in a report on CBC Television's "The National" (Oct. 17), which drew attention to the fact that "Ze'evi believed in anything but passive resistance. His mini Uzi machine-gun was his trademark. He once said he would shoot any Palestinian policeman who so much as asked him for his identity papers."

According to Reports

Some journalists drew a facile moral equivalence between Ze'evi's assassination and Israel's policy of preemptive "targeted killings" of Palestinian extremists caught in the act of planning or committing terrorist attacks against Israelis.

The comparison is baseless. As the Ottawa Citizen editorial of Oct. 18 ("It's not tit-for-tat") put it: "Mr. Ze'evi's death was an act of terror; the killing of Abdel Hamad ['the Hamas militant who helped plan the suicide bombing that killed 21 people in a Tel Aviv night club in June'] was clearly intended to stop terror."

The National Post's editorial, "Arafat's responsibility" (Oct. 18), while not ignoring or condoning Mr. Ze'evi's controversial views, nevertheless also drew more important attention to the faulty moral equivalence argument: "The execution of a civilian [Ze'evi] speaks amply for the morality of those who perpetrated the deed, but it is important to emphasize that the assassinations of Mr. Ze'evi and [PFLP commander] Mustafa Zibri are not morally equal. While Mr. Ze'evi qualified as an extremist, he attacked the Palestinians with words alone. Zibri was a terrorist who repeatedly attacked Israeli civilian targets with deadly force." In this regard it is also crucial that, while making no secret of his attitudes toward the Palestinians, Mr. Ze'evi nevertheless recognized and respected the fact that these attitudes were not shared by the vast majority of Israelis.

The Post is also surely correct about Yasser Arafat's role in Ze'evi's assassination: "Mr. Arafat controls which terrorist cells are closed down and which are given free rein in the Palestinian Authority. Last year, he emptied his prisons in hopes [partially fulfilled] of unleashing a terrorist war that would improve his bargaining position. The Israeli government has repeatedly presented him with a list of killers known to be on the loose. Mr. Arafat refused to comply, with the result that a 75-year-old man lies dead."

AMIA trial reopens wounds for relatives

By FLORENCIA ARBISER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — Since the trial began last month, Olga Degtiar has not worked at her clothing store 50 miles from here.

Instead, Degtiar, 58, has taken a train to downtown Buenos Aires and spent the afternoon inside a courtroom.

In the basement of the court building, 20 people are on trial for their alleged role in the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish centre in which 85 people, including Degtiar's son Cristian,were killed, and some 300 wounded.

Behind reinforced glass, Degtiar and others who lost family members in the attack sit in one of the 22 available seats for victims' relatives.

For several hours, they watch the backs of the 20 defendants – some of whom are accused of supplying the stolen van used in the attack; others with offenses discovered during the investigation process.

Seven years ago, Cristian Degtiar was 21, a law student and an employee at the AMIA centre, the central address for Argentine Jewry that housed communal and social activities and a jobs centre.

"I didn't think the trial was going to impact me so much," Olga Degtiar told JTA. "Facing the people accused and listening to the whole process of the bombing makes me sick."

Pain relievers can't alleviate her headaches and tranquilizers can't help her sleep.

Attending the trial has brought back memories of the July 18, 1994 bombing.

"I recall my daughter's call. I was at my shop," Degtiar says. "My husband started to drive. He had convulsions. When we got to the building, I realized that was the end for me."

Since the attack, Degtiar no longer goes to synagogue – even though her son-in-law is studying to become a rabbi.

"The support comes from my family. But it is not easy," she said. "Inside the family, everyone is living through their own pain, and it makes it hard to hold others."

Some of the victims' relatives – and others in the Jewish community – are skeptical about the trial. After seven years, they say, those who masterminded the attack have yet to be apprehended.

Jorge Lew lost his son, Agustin, who was 21 and working for the AMIA department that handled Jewish burials.

Lew belongs to Memoria Activa, a group of relatives that is critical to the investigation process and asked for the suspension of the trial. "I was not ready to listen about how Agustin was found," he told JTA. "My everyday life has not changed with the beginning of this trial. I will attend the trial on and off," Lew said. "It is only that I feel more anger, unfairness."

As the trial continues, many of the victims' relatives will be seated, with pained looks on their faces, behind the reinforced glass.

Sofia Guterman generally sits next to Degtiar and shares the same empty look of exhaustion. Guterman lost her only daughter, Andrea, who was 28 and at AMIA's employment office looking for a job teaching kindergarten when the bomb went off.

Sofia Guterman's husband, Alberto, is not emotionally prepared for the trial, so Sofia goes every day.

"I don't want an empty chair for Andrea," she said. "Sometimes I do not even hear what is being said. I only keep looking through the reinforced glass to the defendants. I look for a detail that could be different from other humans. I cannot find it."

After Sept. 11, Argentine Jews hope bombing case taken more seriously

BUENOS AIRES — Jewish representatives attending the trial of 20 people implicated in the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish centre here are hoping that last month's terrorist attacks in the United States will help focus attention on this unsolved crime.

"The terrorist episodes in the United States made it even more important to follow the AMIA trial. And the Argentine government knows it, and the court knows it, too," said Jacob Kovadloff, Latin American affairs consultant for the American Jewish Committee (AJC).

Kovadloff has attended the trial along with Kara Stein, assistant legal director for the AJC.

Samuel Kaplan, representing B'nai B'rith International, has also been attending the trial for the bombing, which killed 85 people and wounded 300. Leonard Cole and Martin Raffel of the Jewish Council for Public Affairs attended the first two days.

Israel's ambassador to Argentina, Benjamin Oron, attended the trial's opening as well.

Jewish observers agree that this trial – which focuses on the "local connection" in the attack – is just a first step.

"As long as the people responsible for the attack are not found, there is always the chance that it will happen again, like in September in the United States," Kaplan told JTA.

In addition to the AMIA attack, the 1992 bombing of the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires that killed 29 people also remains unsolved. F.A. JTA

Shoppers Stop is six boutiques in one

Your mission, dear shopper, is simple. Once and for all, address the to-get list whose sense of urgency has escalated from a gentle whisper to a steady roar. Find these six items:

1. An appropriate side table for the living room;
2. A frame for the wedding picture that's been sitting in the drawer since you were married;
3. A new tea cozy;
4. A new duvet, before it gets this-is-Canada cold;
5. A new mattress, so you can enjoy the one third of your life you'll be spending on it;
6. A way to manage this to-get list, because you just know you're not going to find exactly what you want in one day.

Not in one day, but — with the help of Shoppers Stop — perhaps in one hour. This sparkling new 10,000 square foot emporium on Doncaster Avenue in Thornhill aims to take you on a magical mystery tour of affordable treasures for your home.

Combining boutique quality and cachet with power-store selection and low prices, Shoppers Stop offers, under one broad roof, practically everything you'll need to beautify and functionalize your home environment. The key, say owners Seema and Ricky, is "big-store selection with small-store warmth" at the lowest possible prices. "Our goal in opening the store was to offer specialty-store items for every room in the home, not just one or two. The kind of quality and selection that normally take you four or five stops to find, you'll get here in one stop."

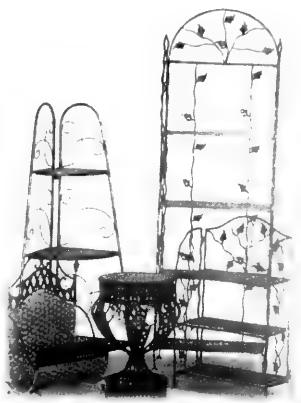
Shoppers Stop caters to every taste and budget. If it's for the home — practical or whimsical, classical or modern — it's here, at a show-stopping price. Once you've adjusted to the notion that you don't have to run to a handful of places, you can relax and enjoy the Shoppers Stop experience.

A leisurely tour of the store and the six room-specific areas that comprise it yields a variety of intriguing discoveries.

Furniture Shop. Decorative chairs, chaise lounges, quilt racks, side tables, draperies, sofa sets, and an exquisite collection of iron ware.

Mirror Shop. All shapes, sizes, and styles — from the utilitarian to the ornate — for every room in the house. (We're looking for one that tells us, on a daily basis, how young and beautiful we are).

Kitchen Shop. China, lovely linens from the Czech Republic, tea cozies and pot holders, mainstream kitchen gadgets, and a number of other unique, useful devices.



Bed Shop. Fine bedding from Israel, including the Royal Sateen® Pavillion collection of bed linens, and hard-to-find 600-thread count sheets; duvets and duvet covers, both natural and synthetic; and wonderful machine-washable and dryable blankets from Spain, in baby to king sizes. Beds from Wesley Allen, among others; mattresses from Ashcroft by Serta's Signature Collection and King Koil's His Majesty.

Bath Shop. A terrific variety of cotton towels (including Rhapsody), mats and rugs, shower curtains and liners, and much more.

Gift Shop. Picture frames galore, candles, jewellery boxes, and a superb selection of glassware highlight this department. Much of the merchandise is made in Italy. In short, it's the perfect one-stop shop for all your wedding, anniversary, and Bar / Bat Mitzvah gifts.

Shoppers Stop offers a Gift Registry for weddings and other special occasions, and Gift Certificates if you prefer to let the recipient have all the fun. If the item you want isn't in stock, your special order will be promptly filled.

Shoppers Stop is affordable, intimate boutique shopping on a grand scale, and a fun way to condense a day of whirlwind shopping into a leisurely hour or two. In an era where "one-stop shopping" has become a cliché, it's nice to find a place that lives up to this billing. So throw away your to-do lists, lose your stopwatch, and relax. Shopping for your home just got a whole lot easier.

Artists thrilled to be in all-female version of Bard's classic comedy

BY BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — Stage and TV star Diane Flacks is one of a group of actors working on an all-female version of William Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream.

She is also scripting TV productions for CBC and for an English TV group. She enjoys performing, she says, adding however, "I really like writing a lot."

Flacks is playing both Titania and Theseus in the new production of A Midsummer Night's Dream, at Theatre Passe Muraille, Nov. 1 to 18.

The music for Shakespeare's comedy is by Rick Sacks, another Jewish artist, a well-known percussionist who will play his music offstage, using, among other things, a glass harmonica invented by Benjamin Franklin, a ploughshare to sound like an Athenian clock chime, and kettle drums.

Both Flacks and Sacks were recruited early by Kate Lynch, the director, who spent years nurturing the idea for this production of the Bard's play. And both are thrilled to be in it.

"I was one of the people who encouraged Kate to make sure it happened," Flacks said.

Other artists are Catherine Fitch, Erin McMurtry, Karen Robinson, Wanda Storms, Camilla Stubel and Kristen Thompson.

Flacks performed in the same play, directed by Lewis Baumander at the Leah Posluns Theatre, when she was a teenager, just starting out on a career that has taken her to the heights.

She starred in PR and Broadsides, two CBC TV programs, and in Sibs, revived in Toronto and currently playing in Manitoba Theatre Centre Warehouse, with music also written by Sacks, who appeared on stage.

She likes her role in A Midsummer Night's Dream , she said, because it gives her a chance to do stage work and is broader in scope than the roles she usually plays in TV and drama.

"Originally, I was supposed to be Puck in the play, because I have a puckish personality and am goofy, mischievous and a clown, but I agreed with Kate when she changed my role and I'm very happy with it. I think it's good at this time in my career to play as an adult and a more serious role."

Flacks said she would only play on the stage if she could make a living at it.

"You must be doing all right now," The CJN commented.

"Thanks God," she replied.

One of the things Sacks, 49, has to figure out is how to get to Pittsburgh during a weekend of the run to play with the Glass Orchestra. Several of the instruments he uses for the music in A Midsummer Night's Dream come from his colleagues in that band.

"I agreed with Kate that in a Shakespeare play, the text is everything and none of the music should come over the text," Sacks said.

"I wrote a song for it, and of course I play transitional music to denote the change in genders. Everybody's got their own thematic material, without getting too film-like in the score. We're trying to keep it natural and playful, the whole thing is just a playful endeavour. We don't want to get grounded. The music is very specific. I use drums for thunder to denote the entrance of Oberon, the King of the Fairies. There will be sound and music all through, but it will be sparse."

Sacks will do all the music himself, working in a separate wing offstage, and will have all the instruments within reach. It's the first time he has done a Shakespeare play and he said he is having fun.

"The wonderful thing about this play is that some of the transformations are being done right on stage – a woman who is playing a man will change back into a woman. Kate is a wonderful director, enabling 17 people to play 12 roles."

Sacks is working on music for Danny, King of the Basement, directed by Richard Greenblatt, at the Young People's Theatre, opening in early November. His first love is chamber music and every chance he gets he plays it or hears it, he said.

One of the finest Canadian movies in years

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

At first glance, Bruce Sweeney's Last Wedding seems like an insouciant, harmless romp into the terrain of contemporary relationships.

On closer inspection, however, its witty exterior is really nothing more than a lulling ruse.

Premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival and now playing at local theatres, Last Wedding is far darker than initial appearances suggest.

The subjects of Sweeney's alternately sweet and acrid film, set in Vancouver, are three warring, thirtysomething couples.

But the focus is on Noah Berger (Benjamin Ratner), a waterproofing specialist, and Zipporah Steinberg (Frida Betrani), an aspiring country rock singer of scant talent. They are secular, middle-class Jews who are planning their wedding as the movie opens in an upscale bridal gown shop.

The two other couples, Peter (Tom Scholte) and Leslie (Nancy Sivak) and Shane (Vincent Gale) and Sarah (Molly Parker), play second fiddle to Noah and Zipporah in terms of screen time.

Although Noah and Zipporah met only six months ago, they are ready to tie the knot, for better or worse.

On a fishing trip, Noah's friends, Peter, a Canadian literature professor, and Shane, an architect, urge him to think it through before he takes the plunge.

Noah's father, having told him a story about his mother and a diseased toilet seat in Tel Aviv, encourages his son to proceed.

Zipporah's mother, a rather crass woman, expresses skepticism about the prospect of an early wedding. Pointing out that they barely know each other, she warns Zipporah to postpone it.

Despite the naysayers, Noah and Zipporah go ahead with their plans. Not being too conversant with Judaism, they learn from a rabbi that their notion of a Saturday wedding ceremony flies in the face of Jewish tradition.

Sweeney works in these cautionary telltale signs of looming trouble with equal dollops of mordant wit and heavy tension.

It's clear that Noah and Zipporah, who seem temperamentally incompatible, are not heading toward the gauzy realm of marital bliss. Indeed, from almost the first moment, they are launched on a disastrous collision course.

After Zipporah hits Noah over the head with an object, an event that exposes their unsuitability once and for all, Noah says lamely, "I think we should have a little talk."

Subsequently, their marriage swiftly deteriorates. Maybe Noah should have listened to his friends' advice.

But lest you think that they are better off than Noah, perish the thought immediately.

Peter and his unsmiling partner, Leslie, a librarian, are far from being happy. And when Peter, out of boredom, starts what he later describes as an "inconsequential" affair with a fetching student fond of erotic poetry, their relationship crashes into a wall of jealousy and resentment.

Zipporah (Frida Betrani) and Noah (Benjamin Ratner) in Last Wedding.

The glue that holds Shane and Sarah together also comes unstuck in short order.

For starters, Shane, who has grown disillusioned with his craft, does not exactly appreciate Sarah's PhD thesis on architecture. She is disappointed by his reaction. He tries to make amends, but to little avail.

To add insult to injury, Shane is no admirer of the blue chip firm that employs Sarah. She does not take kindly to his jaundiced opinion. Making matters worse is Shane's disinterest in sex.

Sweeney, a director and writer of immense promise, skilfully turns these separate but interconnected stories of marital dysfunction and disillusionment into a compelling script.

The actors help him immeasureably. Ratner and Betrani personify restraint and fickleness, while Scholte and Sivak convey stolidity in the face of disintegration. Gale and Parker both seethe with quiet angst.

In short, Last Wedding is an accomplished film, certainly one of the finest Canadian ones in several years.

Classic Schlesinger thriller ages remarkably well

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Marathon Man, John Schlesinger's 1976 thriller turning on a vicious Nazi war criminal, has aged remarkably well.

Twenty five years on, it's as taut and riveting as the first time around.

A film with unexpected twists and turns, TVOntario will screen it on Saturday, Oct. 27 at 8 p.m.

Starring Dustin Hoffman and Laurence Olivier, Marathon Man is set in New York City, Paris and the South American jungle.

Two hours long, it brims with foreign intrigue and violence and is coated by a thin layer of romance.

The protagonists are a graduate student in history (Hoffman), a U.S. secret agent (Roy Scheider), a Swiss overseas student (Marthe Keller) and a German war criminal (Olivier), known as the White Angel, who has yet to be brought to justice.

He is loosely based on Dr. Joseph Mengele, the infamous Angel of Death in the Auschwitz concentration camp.

Christian Zell, the wily, ruthless character skillfuly portrayed by Olivier, has emerged from his steamy hideout in Uruguay to claim an ill-gotten prize: a cache of diamonds he extorted from Jewish inmates in Auschwitz.

In his zealous quest, Zell crosses paths with Hoffman, Scheider and Keller, sometimes with fatal, messy results.

It doesn't take long for Schlesinger to establish the mood of menace that frames much of the movie.

In one of the first scenes, which takes place on Yom Kippur, two elderly men – a Jew and a German – taunt each other in a bumper-car display of bravado as they drive through the crowded streets of Manhattan.

Shortly afterward, in Paris, a man's throat is slit at the opera and Scheider is attacked by an Oriental assassin wielding a razor-sharp whip. Back in Manhattan, Hoffman and Keller are assaulted by two thugs in Central Park.

The most famous scene, a Hollywood classic still remembered by viewers who might otherwise have forgotten the film, concerns dentistry of a primtive, cruel kind as practised by the calm and collected Olivier.

Another scene worth recalling is when Hoffman forces Olivier to swallow his glittering baubles.

Marathon Man, while hardly the stuff of great cinema, churns and rumbles with excitement and even élan. Call it a pleasurable night of entertainment.

Adventurous travel destinations

If you're an active, adventurous person, a sandy beach may not be enough. You may want to spend your vacation doing something rather more strenuous, like hiking or cycling.

Lonely Planet, distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books, has just published several books that may help you plan such a vacation.

Trekking in the Moroccan Atlas advises you which trails to choose, how to stay healthy on the trek, how to identify Moroccan flora and fauna and where to stay at the beginning of the trip.

Japan is an extremely crowded country, but two-thirds of its surface area consists of mountains. Hiking in Japan pulls you away from Japan's congested cities and allows you to zero in on its pristine natural wonders, including its high peaks, gorges and subtropical jungles.

If you're a cyclist, look no further than Cycling in Britain. This guidebook recommends the backwoods roads to use, the bike shops to visit in case of problems and the camping grounds, bed and breakfasts and hotels to frequent after a long day on the saddle.

Western Canada is an ideal destination for travellers who revel in the outdoors. So if you're thinking of heading west, try reading British Columbia, your guide to its mountains, forests, lakes and rivers (as well as its towns and cities).

You should always be prepared for trouble. What if you're bitten by a scorpion? How do you survive if you're lost in a jungle? How do you purify water? How do you control a runaway camel? The Worst-Case Scenario Survival Handbook answers these and other questions. You're in good hands with this book.

Rabbi Alper tickles his congregation's funny bone

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — There may be little to laugh at these days but it's a sure thing that rabbi/comedian, Bob Alper will find many topics to jest about that will make you laugh.

Rabbi Alper, called "the world's only practicing clergyman doing stand-up comedy, intentionally," will present his internationally acclaimed 90-minute show on Nov. 1 at 8 p.m. at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, 3080 Bayview Ave. The funds raised at the comedy evening will support adult education programs at Beth Tikvah. The event is headed by Alf Kwinter and Maurice Kulik. Kwinter, who is Beth Tikvah's legal chair and resident comic, has performed comedy acts in many synagogues and organizations.

"I thought I was funny but this guy is a riot, and he can daven too," Kwinter said.

Kulik, a member of the shul's executive says, "Bob Alper has taken Catskills style stand-up comedy to a refined new level. His comedy is thoughtful and self-deprecating and full of the funny vignettes so close to home for the whole audience."

The one-man show does not resemble the humour of most contemporary comedians. He has many funny God related stories and his humour is clean, funny for people of all ages, not insulting, and is based on the foibles of life--marriage, family, children, pets, community--you name it.

Rabbi Alper, 56, believes that part of his calling as a clergyman is to make people laugh. He performs over 100 times a year throughout North America for synagogues, conventions and at comedy clubs.

He is the author of, Life Doesn't Get Any Better Than This (Liquori Press). The book combines his rabbinical experiences and wisdom with life's many challenges, all with gentle humor. He has been seen recently on TV's top-rated entertainment programs. He writes for a number of newspapers and has produced audio tapes. Rabbi Alper was featured in London, England at The New End Theater for a full week and at the West London Synagogue where he also presented a guest sermon.

A Vermont resident and native of Providence, R.I., Rabbi Alper is a graduate of Lehigh University, was ordained at Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati and is the first Jewish person ever to earn a Doctor of Ministry degree from the Princeton Theological Seminary in New Jersey.

He served congregations in Buffalo and Philadelphia. He is on the road full time but continues to conduct services on the High Holidays.

Recently, he performed in Montreal for three days to sell-out audiences at the Just For Laughs Comedy Festival. Tickets are $21 if purchased in advance and $24 at the door. Tickets are available at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, 416-221-3433, and at Negev Book & Gift Store, Matana Judaica, and Israel's The Judaica Centre.

NEW BOOK FOCUSES ON CANADIAN JEWS

McGill professor Morton Weinfeld has written a new book about the Jews of Canada that explores the history and diversity of the Jewish people in our particular corner of the Diaspora.

According to a press release, Like Everyone Else... But Different presents an alluring and credible thesis: "Despite their troubled history, Canada's Jews are on their way to becoming the world's second-most important Diaspora community, and enjoy a quality of life unmatched since the Golden Age of Spain."

Weinfeld reads from and discusses the book at the Miles S. Nadal JCC (formerly the Bloor JCC), where he is to be introduced by historian Harold Troper. Wednesday, Oct. 24, 7:30 p.m. Members free, non-members $5. 416-924-6211.

Parchment* Launch: The launch of the 10th anniversary issue of Parchment, Canada's journal of Jewish creative writing, is set for Sunday, Nov. 11, as part of the Jewish Book Fair. Please note that the date was incorrectly listed as Nov. 4 in the Book Fair program.

The event is also part of the regular Books & Bagels series; refreshments to be served. Writers scheduled to read include Ken Sherman, Marc Litovitz, Ron Ruskin, Lisa Lidor, Ron Charach, Dan Goorevich and Shirley Kumove. Miles S. Nadal JCC, Bloor and Spadina. Nov. 11, 11 a.m.

A Dance on Film: A half-hour film of the Allen Kaeja-choreographed Resistance, produced in association with Bravo! Canada, is being screened with Moze Mossanan's Rings of Saturn as part of the Moving Pictures Film Festival. An awards ceremony and reception follow. $8 at the door. Bloor Cinema, 506 Bloor Street W. Saturday, Nov. 3, 8 p.m. 416-961-5424.

Mishnah Illuminated: Montreal professor Jack Lightstone returns to his native Ottawa soon to speak on Mishnah's Rhetoric and the Social Formation of the Early Guild of Rabbis.

Lightstone, a professor at Concordia, is the author of many scholarly articles as well as the forthcoming book, Mishnah and Social Formation of the Early Rabbinic Guild.

The National Library of Canada and the Council of the Jacob M. Lowy Collection are jointly sponsoring the free lecture. Lightstone will discuss the linguistic conventions and rhetorical models of the Mishnah as well as the rabbinical masters who dominated Judaism in the first centuries of the Common Era, using visual aids from the Jacob M. Lowy Collection of rare Hebraica and Judaica.

Cheryl Jaffee, curator of the collection, likens Lightstone's work in this area to detective work.

"The text of the Mishnah is the heart of the Talmud, and the Talmud is the core text of rabbinic Judaism," she said. "But we have little information about the scholars whose discourse is captured here, beyond what the text itself may reveal to us. Just as an archeologist examines an artifact to uncover its historical significance, Prof. Lightstone will examine language for the layers of information it can impart to us."

Auditorium, National Library of Canada, 395 Wellington St., Ottawa. 7:30 p.m. Reception to follow. Thursday, Nov. 1, 7:30 p.m.

Children's Rescue: An hour-long Czech-made documentary, Power of Humanity – Nicholas Winton, focuses on Winton's courageous rescue of 669 predominantly Jewish children in 1938 and 1939. Its narrator is CBC correspondent Joe Schlesinger, who was one of the children Winton managed to transport to Great Britain. Winton, who is a 92-year-old resident of Maidenhead, England, also participated in the film, which aired recently in the Czech Republic and Slovakia.

The film is due for broadcast, and for inclusion in several film festivals, in North America, Europe, Israel, Australia and New Zealand this autumn. The Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles plans to present Winton with the Simon Wiesenthal Award at the film's American premiere.

Baycrest Centre addresses financial deficit

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Senior staff, family members and volunteers of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care have embarked on a mission to maintain Baycrest's role as a leader on the international scene while addressing its financial deficit.

In a recent interview, Stephen Herbert, president and chief executive officer, and Laurie Harrison, vice-president, finance and administration, spoke of Baycrest's attempt to cope with reductions in government subsidies and decreasing income, and the growing demand for services as people are living longer.

Baycrest – which operates the Apotex Centre, the Jewish Home for the Aged, Baycrest Hospital, Community Day Services for Seniors, the Wagman Centre, the Terrace and Elmridge residence, and also provides home services – has been recognized for its high level of care.

Its problems are the same as those faced by other health-care facilities. But Baycrest has special needs that require additional funding – maintaining a Jewish environment with cultural and religious facilities and kosher food, and providing special programming for more than half the residents who are Holocaust survivors.

Harrison said few in the community are aware that the actual cost of care for a resident at the JHA is $147.31 a day while the revenue is $102.04 – a shortfall of $45.27 per resident per day.

This, along with the deficits in operating the other departments, will result in a projected budgetary deficit of more than $10 million in 2001-2002, before grants from the Baycrest Foundation.

Facing this reality, Baycrest has embarked on its new mission.

Herbert said the first phase in dealing with these realities was to share information with those involved with Baycrest and interested parties in the community.

"We have been blown away by the response," Herbert said. "We have centralized our data and our mandate is to keep the client's best interest as our primary role."

There is a growing demand for services as people live longer – people who now reside in Baycrest and those who use the services are older and more disabled and many have advanced cognitive problems. Throughout the centre, the waiting lists continue to grow.

"As an example of the changes, the people who now reside in Baycrest Terrace, which was created for the well elderly, are people who previously lived in the JHA," Herbert said.

In past years, some five percent of those in the JHA needed additional help, he added, and "today most residents are in wheelchairs or use walkers, and many are not mobile at all."

Herbert noted that until recently, most residents were able to go down to the dining room for meals. "Today, we see more and more swallowing disorders. These individuals require special pureed food and one-on-one assistance at mealtime."

Funding, he said, has not kept pace with needs. With more frail elderly people remaining in their homes, many of them on waiting lists, the centre has developed community-based services that include nursing, caregiver relief, companions, escort to medical appointments, telephone support to seniors and an osteoporosis program. There are now several thousand people taking advantage of these services, which do not receive any government funding.

So why did Baycrest embark on a new building? Herbert explained that the old JHA building no longer met government standards and required extensive renovations. As well, the government acknowledged that the JHA required an additional 100 beds.

When the situation was examined almost a decade ago, three options were open to Baycrest, Herbert said: Renovate the existing building, floor by floor, which would disrupt the home, be very costly and reduce the number of beds. Add a new wing and upgrade the existing building to meet government standards, at a prohibitive cost and again with a loss of existing beds. Or build a new structure.

"The board and the ministry agreed that the most viable and cost efficient plan was to create a new building, and it was then that a building campaign was undertaken."

Harrison said the major drop in expected funding came during the building of the new Apotex Centre. North York committed some $17 million to the new building and with amalgamation in Toronto, this funding was wiped out.

"The shortfall had to be funded through a mortgage, which requires steep interest payments," Harrison said.

Over the past few years, the mounting deficit has been covered through Baycrest Foundation grants, which come from community donations.

"If we continue funding the deficit from the foundation at this rate, we will deplete the resources in the foundation," Herbert said.

"This coming year," he said, "we must increase the revenue and we must decrease expenses so that we can eliminate approximately $2 million in inflation and significantly reduce the existing deficit."

He is pleased that Baycrest's new independent living building Two Neptune Drive, a condominium-style seniors' building, is open and filling up. But recently plans to develop two new nursing homes in the Greater Toronto Area and York Region have been put on hold.

Baycrest has created an Information Line, (416-785-2500, ext. 6397) and Herbert said "the community is invited to send in suggestions and ideas to improve the current crunch at Baycrest."

At the centre's annual meeting Geoffrey Matus, the new chair of the Baycrest board of directors said that, like other health-care organizations, Baycrest is "facing significant challenges that will test our willingness and ability to lead through change.

"Some changes may be welcomed while others may be unpopular, but we are doing all we can to minimize any negative impact. Baycrest needs the help of the community as well as the government if we are to fulfil our mission to enrich the lives of the elderly.

"I am committed to intensifying our fund-raising efforts and to streamlining operations so that we can achieve our mission and be fiscally responsible."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. Is it OK to give my seven-month-old son fork-mashed food?

A. Yes, as long as he is accepting the texture and not gagging, and as long as it is soft food that is very well mashed, it does not need to be puréed. In fact, this will likely make for an easier transition to solids. Try fork-mashed banana, baked apple, ripe peaches, sweet potato, boiled carrots, potato or squash, etc.

Q. Now that school has started again, I am focusing on what I can offer my kids for healthy breakfasts that are quick and offer some nutrition while still pleasing them. They love frozen waffles, grilled cheese and muffins, and always ask for chocolate milk.

A. Your children's favourites are not terrible choices. Make the following modifications and rest assured that they're heading off with a full tummy. Buy multigrain frozen waffles; make muffins with whole wheat flour or oatmeal (it's OK to add chocolate chips or raisins) ; use whole wheat bread for the grilled cheese. Try mixing the chocolate milk with half plain milk so that it will be a little less sweet.

'The Jewish Horse' is all the rage at Fort Erie

By HARLAN ABBEY
Special to The CJN

BUFFALO — Point Given, winner of the Preakness and Belmont Stakes, may get headlines on the nation's sports pages, but around the backstretch at Fort Erie Race Track, the talk is all about "The Jewish Horse."

Academic Educator, a five-year-old bay mare, got that nickname because the racing colours of her owners, Conrad and Susan Cohen, are white with a blue magen david on the front, back and sleeves.

Dan Hill, Cohen's assistant, carries the religious motif further by having the six-pointed star painted on Academic Educator's stall door, the box containing the mare's grooming equipment, and also embroidered on the saddlecloth she wears during early morning exercise runs. The colour motif continues on race days, when her four white support bandages get two strips of blue trimming.

Neither Cohen nor Hill has ever heard an anti-Semitic remark regarding their horse or the colours she carries or the Jewish star decorating her stable. This is in line with an old racing adage: "On the turf, as under it, all men are equal."

Of course, Academic Educator's colours would get unnoticed if she was just an average race horse. But she isn't. Last year she won six of 10 starts at Fort Erie, plus a second place finish, to earn $42,886 and merit the title, "Horse of the Year, Mare Long-Distance Runner."

This year, she finished second in her first start, but the Cohens, Hill and jockey Mike Quong expect to be in the winners' circle often.

Horse racing is one of the most tradition-bound sports there is. It took centuries before women could be licensed as trainers, and there was a lawsuit before they could become jockeys. Horses' names cannot have a commercial connotation, which also is barred from racing silks.

"I guess the powers-that-be weren't as strict when I applied for my colours some 40 years ago," said Cohen, now semi-retired after years of being one of the top trainers in Canadian racing. In fact, Academic Educator is the only horse the Cohens own.

"I wanted to spend more time with our four grand-daughters, so I thought I'd just get one horse for us to have some fun with. I figured if she won some seconds and thirds she'd pay her way," Cohen said.

Academic Educator has done a lot better than that, but she almost didn't get claimed by Conrad. "Our granddaughter Lauren was born last June 25 at 11 a.m. I had to do some fancy driving to get to Fort Erie in time to make the claim.

Conrad Cohen (right) with jockey Mike Quong.

"Of course, that wasn't as important a time as when I turned down a $5,000 offer 10 years ago for Ready Roadster, which I bought for $2,500.

"I told my wife 'Don't worry, this horse will pay for our son Howard's bar mitzvah.' "

The horse won over $250,000 during his racing career. Other top horses Cohen trained during his many years on the backstretch included Silken Wrapper, a winner of 21 races after being claimed for $3,200; Royal Colleen, winner of over $1 million; Come In Dad and Centrillium, both winners of the Sovereign Award as Canadian Horse of the Year in different age/sex categories.

Those racetrack success stories hardly seemed probable when the lifelong horseman started out: "I bought a thoroughbred mare as a riding horse, bred her to a stallion and raised the foal, who drank milk instead of water his first several months. A veterinarian examined him and said he had a damaged heart and [he told us] to destroy him.

"I wouldn't do that. He was my pet, he did tricks, he won ribbons in the breeding divisions at the Royal Winter Fair. After six months of stall rest and Vitamin E injections, he finally was OK. I named him Sir Conrad, after asking a rabbi for help in naming him. He won his first start easily, then a pasture gate was left open, and he was hit by a car and killed.

"In horse racing, the 'elevator' can come down as fast as it goes up."

Besides being a leading trainer, Cohen has been a vice-president of the Horsemen's Benevolent and Protective Association, which represents owners and trainers in negotiations with race track management.

"The slot machine income has had a fantastic short term benefit, helping horsemen who have been through hard times," he noted. "Simulcasting outlets and the casinos help increase income that would drop because of bad weather. We have to maintain live racing to support all the people employed in our sport."

Conrad is married to the former Susan Rosenberg, who was supportive of his career choice even though it meant her husband woke at 4:30 a.m. seven days a week. His parents also did not object to his unusual career path: "They thought I had the brains to succeed at any job I chose."

Soccer shocker: Hapoel stuns Chelsea

By ORI LEWIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hapoel Tel Aviv wrote yet another chapter of the still unfinished first volume of Israeli soccer upsets when it stunned Chelsea 2-0 in their UEFA Cup second round, first leg match last week in Jaffa.

Two late goals gave the Israelis a real chance at advancing to the next round, as a Shimon Gershon penalty in the 87th minute and a Sergei Clescenko goal in injury time sealed the result.

The Tel Aviv side started the game as clear underdogs, despite the fact Chelsea fielded a depleted lineup. Citing security concerns, six first-team players decided not to travel to Israel.

Tel Aviv played as equals for most of the game against their more illustrious opponents and closed down the chances for the London club, as both its forwards, Jimmy Floyd Hasselbaink and Gianfranco Zola, hardly got a chance for a shot on goal.

Hapoel's defence, led by captain Gershon, kept up with Chelsea's big men and ran down all their attempts to attack the Tel Aviv goal.

While Chelsea only had three shots at Shavit Elimelech's goal, Hapoel set up a string of good opportunities, but failed to find the finishing touch.

Chelsea picked up the pace in the second half, but suffered a severe setback when Mario Melchiot was sent off for kicking Gershon in the Hapoel zone after a corner kick in the 54th minute.

With the minutes ticking away, Hapoel's players were tiring, but so were the Chelsea's. Hapoel again had some excellent chances on the counter-attack and in one flurry in the 79th minute, a string of Hapoel chances failed to yield a goal.

With all Hapoel's players pushing forward and veteran midfielder Yossi Abuksis controlling play in the rear, the breakthrough finally came in the 87th minute when John Terry mishandled the ball deep in his own zone to give Hapoel a clear scoring chance.

Gershon made no mistake with his kick, as he put the ball firmly in the back of the net to send the crowd of 17,000 into wild delirium.

Clescenko added the second goal, deep in injury time, when he sneaked in a header which rebounded off the left upright.

"This is the one of the greatest victories for Israeli soccer ever," Hapoel coach Dror Kashtan said after the match.

Chelsea coach Claudio Ranieri said: "I don't want to talk about the players who stayed at home. It was an incredible end to the match...It will be very difficult to stay in the UEFA Cup. A one-goal [deficit] is not too bad, but two makes it very difficult."

I have been best friends with a girl since Grade 1 and we have always been very similar and shared everything.

Recently, she has become very religious and I feel as though we don't have much in common anymore. I am worried that her value system will completely change and it will be impossible for us to remain friends. Should I give her some distance to pursue her new interests or should I try hard to retain the friendship?

Disheartened

About Teens

Dear Disheartened,

It is always difficult when you feel that a friend is changing and growing away from you. But it is usually possible to retain the friendship if that's what you want to do.

Talk to your friend about the recent change. Ask her to explain her new system of values.

If you feel as though her views and way of life have changed drastically, then you should try talking about the things you normally talked about before she changed. Chances are you'll find that even if your conversation doesn't go exactly the same way as you would have expected it to go in the past, you'll enjoy talking to her just as much.

If, however, you feel she has changed so much that you can't speak to her as a good friend, then give her a few weeks of distance. She will most likely balance out her new observance with her old friendships and you'll find she's still the same person.

You could even try letting her introduce you to some of her new customs. You may discover a newfound appreciation for religious values. You do not need to become more religious yourself, but it could help you to better understand where she's coming from.

It is also possible that her new lifestyle won't affect your friendship at all. You may still wind up doing the same things together and the issue may never come up at all. It is, however, always best to talk about any changes, just to keep things open.

On a final note, remember not to forsake a good friendship because of these changes. I wish you and your friend the best of luck and I'm sure you will remain friends for a very long time.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

No diplomatic solution to terror

— Exclusive interview with Charles Krauthammer —

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The so-called "new normal" – the heightened threat of danger – in the wake of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks isn't so new, according to Charles Krauthammer.

"We've lived in an unusual last half century. It couldn't possibly last. The last 10 years in particular, there was total peace and prosperity, peace from danger. The kind of peace we've had in the world over the last 50 years is unheard of in human history. We're reverting to a norm," said the syndicated columnist from his Washington office last week.

Charles Krauthammer

Krauthammer, who won a Pulitzer Prize in 1987 for distinguished commentary and who is known for his pro-Israel views, will be in town this Sunday to speak at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Major Gifts dinner. He will discuss the war against terrorism,

Feld Carr rescues family from Syria

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Just when she thought it was over, another family in Syria needed Judy Feld Carr's help.

In September, a Jewish couple and their seven children fled Damascus and landed safely in New York, assisted by Carr and her Toronto-based Dr. Ronald Feld Fund for Jews in Arab Lands.

The fund, which had been dormant, was quickly reactivated to help pay for the departure of Faraj Helwani, 52, his wife Marsil, and their seven children, aged four to 12.

"It was a straight purchase," Carr says matter-of-factly. "We bought them."

The family's departure means there are now just 38 Jews left in Syria, all of them in Damascus: a couple and their five children, and 31 mainly elderly people who are too ill or frail to leave, or don't want to.

The rescue of the Helwanis brings the total number of Syrian

Vets Compensated

OTTAWA — Veterans Affairs Minister Ron Duhamel announced last week that 15 surviving Canadian servicemen will finally receive compensation from Germany for having been interned at the Buchenwald concentration camp. The veterans will receive an initial instalment of about $5,400, representing half the maximum per person. The money will come from the $8-billion fund set up last year by Germany and German industries to compensate one-time slave and forced labourers.

Mossad Blamed

JERUSALEM — Syria's defence minister claims the Mossad planned the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Mustafa Tlas said the Israeli spy agency also instructed thousands of Jewish employees at the Twin Towers not to go to work that day, the Jerusalem Post reports.

Monitoring Hatred

JERUSALEM — The Israeli government and the Jewish Agency have inaugurated a Web site to monitor anti-Semitic incidents around the world. An interactive feature allows users to report incidents they experienced or witnessed. The site, available in English and Hebrew, is at www.antisemitism.org.il.

Kalejs Appeal

SYDNEY — A Nazi war crimes suspect was wheeled into an Australian court on a stretcher last week for the start of his appeal against extradition to Latvia. The lawyer for 88-year-old Konrad Kalejs said his client suffers from dementia. For years, Kalejs, who lived briefly in Toronto, has faced charges of being involved in the wartime slaughter of 30,000 Jews while serving as an officer in Latvia's pro-Nazi Arajs Kommando unit.

Presidential No-Show

RECIFE, Brazil — The opening of a Jewish centre on the site of a 17th-century synagogue in Brazil was indefinitely postponed after the country's president refused to attend a dedication ceremony because he feared a terrorist attack. The centre in the city of Recife, where the Zur Israel Synagogue once stood, is slated to host public lectures and an exhibit on Jewish immigration to Brazil.

Rabbi's Trial

CAMDEN, N.J. — A former private investigator has testified that a New Jersey rabbi paid him to kill the rabbi's wife and that the rabbi made the payment while sitting shivah after the murder was committed. Leonard Jenoff testified in the trial of Rabbi Fred Neulander, accused of arranging the murder of his wife Carol, who was found beaten to death at the couple's home in 1994.

Novak Honoured

TEANECK, N.J. — Rabbi David Novak, a professor at the University of Toronto's Jewish studies department, and his wife Melva, will be honoured by the Union for Traditional Judaism (UTJ) at the group's gala fall dinner here Nov. 7. Rabbi Novak is co-founder and vice-president of the UTJ, which represents Judaism's traditional wing.

Paper Apologizes

NEW YORK — A Web site for Jewish jobs in North America was launched last week, jewishjobfinder.com, which is free for both job seekers and recruiters, offers general information on careers in Jewish organizations and serves as a clearing house for job listings.

A Nice, Jewish Girl...

PHILADELPHIA — Playboy magazine's latest centrefold is not only Jewish, but proud of it. Miss November, Lindsey Vuolo, 20, from Princeton, N.J., told the magazine about her 1999 trip to Israel. "Being in Jerusalem was so emotional for me – I broke down and cried," she said. "I'm proud to be Jewish, and I'm proud to have this title."

ADL Issues List of Hate Music Groups

NEW YORK — The Anti-Defamation League recently issued a list of bands that promote racist, bigoted or hateful ideas.

The list, Bigots Who Rock: An ADL List of Hate Music Groups, identifies 541 rock bands, primarily based in the United States and Europe, that use hate-filled lyrics or have active links to organized hate groups.

The list is available at the ADL's Web site, http://www.adl.org, along with links to additional information on the hate music scene, extremist groups and the burgeoning hate recording industry.

The list was issued on the eve of what the ADL describes as one of the largest annual hate music festivals in the United States, Hammerfest 2001. This year's is the third annual festival sponsored by Hammerskin Nation, a neo-Nazi group that uses hardcore music as a vehicle to disseminate white supremacist beliefs.

Miles Nadal Bloor JCC gets off the ground

$10-million facelift, renovation planned

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With the swing of a golden sledgehammer, businessman and philanthropist Miles Nadal ceremoniously broke ground – and a section of the inside wall – at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC).

Forty-eight years after it opened its doors, the tired old building at Bloor St. and Spadina Ave. is getting a $10-million facelift and multi-phase renovation that should ensure its future as the heart of a revitalized downtown Jewish community.

The refurbished old building will be "the place to be" and centre for downtown Jewish life, said Mark Sarner, president of the centre. "It is a bellwether of the vitality and health of the Jewish community."

Nadal, who contributed about $2.1 million towards the project, is the prime benefactor behind the planned renovation, which has seen the centre re-named the Miles S. Nadal Bloor JCC in his honour.

The renovation will give the centre four income-producing commercial tenants, a new 300-seat theatre, aerobics studios, offices, meeting rooms and a new look to propel it into the 21st century.

The project is part of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) initiative, a community-wide infrastructure improvement plan.

Part one of the project, in which four shops will open on Bloor Street, is expected to be completed by June 2002. Other behind-the-scene renovations affecting the centre's internal works have already begun.

About 150 guests were in a celebratory mood last week as the centre marked the official ground-breaking of the revamped centre.

Nine years ago, Sarner noted, the Jewish Community Centre, including its Bloor branch, was insolvent and in danger of going out of business. Suggestions were being floated that the "Bloor Y" had outlived its usefulness and that it should be sold to help pay off the enormous debts run up by the centre's Bathurst branch.

Instead, a group of members, meeting on the rooftop, came up with the idea of buying the facility and keeping it as a going concern, serving the estimated 20,000 Jews living south of Eglinton Avenue.

Balfour's declaration

From the editor's desk

Palestinian spokesmen speak to the world in veiled terminology, using words such as "occupation" that suggest one meaning to the West but intend another to the Arab world.

Many in the West perceive the current struggle as if its history began only in June 1967 or Sept. 28, 2000. But the conflict has a much longer history; the Jewish people have a much longer tie to the land than the Palestinian leadership wants the world to know about.

History, ancient and modern, is important both for its own sake and for understanding the full context of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. One such important moment in modern history occurred on the date Nov. 2.

Great Britain's Foreign Secretary Arthur James Balfour wrote his famous declaration to the Jewish people on Nov. 2, 1917. It was a key moment of encouragement to the young Zionist movement in the early part of the last century. It gave public legitimacy to the movement and sent out enormous waves of hope that after the Great War, steps would be taken by Great Britain to officially and formally assist the return of the Jewish people to their ancestral homeland.

The declaration was made public a week after it was written. Its promulgation in England evoked celebrations throughout the Jewish world.

The text of the declaration was concise.

"Dear Lord Rothschild, I have much pleasure in conveying to you, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, the following declaration of sympathy with Jewish Zionist aspirations which has been submitted to, and approved by, the Cabinet.

"His Majesty's Government view with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavours to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country.

"I should be grateful if you would bring this declaration to the knowledge of the Zionist Federation. Yours, Arthur James Balfour."

The response by Lord Rothschild followed two days later, on Nov. 4. It was equally concise.

"Dear Mr. Balfour, I write to thank you most sincerely for your letter and also for the great interest you have shown in the wishes of the large mass of the Jewish people and also for the efforts and trouble you have taken on their behalf. I can assure you that the gratitude of ten millions of people will be yours, for the British Government has opened up, by their message, a prospect of safety and comfort to large masses of people who are in need of it. I dare say you have been informed that already in many parts of Russia renewed persecution has broken out. With renewed thanks to you and His Majesty's Government, I remain, Yours sincerely, Rothschild."

In his autobiography, Trial and Error, Chaim Weizmann, who was instrumental in eliciting the declaration from Lord Balfour and who subsequently became the first president of Israel, wrote the following about the immediate impact of the declaration.

"A generation has passed since the Balfour Declaration became history. It is not easy to recapture, at this distance, the spirit of elation which attended its issuance – a spirit shared by non-Jews and Jews alike: on the Jewish side the expectation of imminent redemption, on the non-Jewish side the profound satisfaction awakened by a great act of restitution. Certainly there were dissident voices on both sides, but they were overborne by numbers and by moral authority."

The photo below is a poignant example of the "spirit of elation" of which Weizmann wrote. It shows the celebration 84 years ago in Toronto that "attended the issuance of the declaration." A procession of Balfour Declaration supporters marches past City Hall.

A letter written at the time by Freyda Kurtz Weinreb to her sister in the United States described the occasion: "...Since last Wednesday on we have had only celebrations. [May no evil eye touch us.] On Sunday there was a march with all the rabbis. There were many bands. Every night in another place there is a gathering. It is a joyful, lebedik time."

Ruth Weinreb Freed, the letter-writer's daughter, subsequently recalled the event as an occasion of "rejoicing with music and bands and people cheering from cars and upstairs windows."

Unfortunately, to its everlasting shame, Great Britain ultimately reneged on its commitment in the declaration. But even that betrayal could not prevent the establishment of a national home for the Jewish people in their ancestral land. And after that event, the celebrations were even more effusive and even more vastly heartfelt as a moment standing out of time.

Alas, another moment in Jewish history that we must recall occurred merely six years ago on the 12th day of the month of Cheshvan (last Sunday in the Jewish calendar, Sunday Nov. 4 in the general calendar). Israel's prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated, shot in the back by Yigal Amir.

Memorial commemorations of that black day began in Israel on Sunday and are continuing throughout the week. Within our own circles, at home around the table and among our friends, we too should remember that terrible moment on that terrible night when an Israeli prime minister was cut down by one of Israel's children.

Gershon and the World Trade Centre

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

On September 11, 2001 a remarkable observant Jew went missing after being on the 100th floor of the World Trade Centre when it collapsed. What made Gershon remarkable to us is the heroic way in which he died and what he did just beforehand. However, to his family, I'm sure the person and his love easily transcended such awesome heroism.

But first, some background. In the Torah, in the book of Devarim (Deuteronomy), God gave Israel divorce laws. Under Jewish law (Halacha), a woman cannot remarry, have relations with another man, date, or even be seen alone with another man unless she is formally divorced. Although rabbis supervise the ceremony, no Rabbi can "issue" a divorce decree. For a Jewish divorce, a man must give a written Bill of Divorce or "Get" to his wife and the wife must freely accept it. Both must do so of their own free will and without coercion.

If a man disappears and his earthly remains cannot be found, then a woman becomes an agunah — a woman who is not free to remarry or even to socialize. Any child of a subsequent relationship is considered to be a bastard, or mamzer, and such a child can only marry other mamzerim or converts to Judaism. Any child of a mamzer to the tenth generation following suffers from the same restrictions. In most Conservative synagogues, all Orthodox synagogues and in the State of Israel, it is impossible to remarry without a Get.

Consequences of not obtaining a Get

Many Reform rabbis also privately counsel their congregates to go to a Jewish Court to obtain a Get, even though elements of the Reform movement no longer consider it necessary.

For these reasons, observant and non-observant women and men alike are anxious to obtain a Get in addition to a secular divorce from a Canadian or American Court. If a secular divorce is obtained, the estranged wife still requires a Get to remarry under Jewish law. Some husbands and wives have unfortunately refused to consent to a Get, leaving their spouses socially stranded until death. In Israel, the recalcitrant spouses are occasionally imprisoned for such behaviour, or they may forfeit bank accounts or even professional licenses. One such man sat in jail for 30 years and died there rather than free his wife from her marital bonds. Others uphold the Get and blackmail their spouses until the victimized spouse relinquishes some or all of her rights, under law, to financial support, property division or custody of children. It is not uncommon for the victimized spouse to pay ransom money for her Get, often in large amounts (such as the value of a house or condominium).

During the period of 1986-91, I was privileged to act as counsel to Toronto's Orthodox Rabbinical Counsel and B'nai Brith Canada. We led a coalition of groups to assist the agunah. In so doing, we drafted — and were successful in having enacted — legislation to make it very difficult for the recalcitrant spouse to victimize his estranged spouse, first in Ontario and eventually all across Canada. Now, if a spouse refuses to consent to a Get and applies to a Canadian Court for financial relief of any kind or for rights relating to his children, then the Court can refuse to consider his case until he gives his wife a Get. In the past 15 years this law has been very effective. Many Jews now give their spouses Gitten only because they fear the legal and severe financial consequences of not doing so.

I had initially understood the Torah's commandment to give your wife a Get an odd one. It is one of the 613 Mitzvot (commandments). Surely it cannot mean that we should all get divorced!

The commandment rather means that if one is angry and hurt during a marital separation, he should set aside his anger or grief and not deny his spouse the ability to remarry. We, as Jews, are thankfully blessed. Most of us do not indulge in such behaviour if we are asked to consent to a Get. Even before the Canadian laws or the Israeli laws were passed, only a minority of separated spouses refused to do so.

In my understanding, this Torah law also means that Jews should help any woman (or man) who is being victimized by their estranged spouse. Aside from offering comfort to agunot and ensuring that they do not feel socially isolated, Jews are commanded to do everything in their power to obtain a spouse's consent to a Get. There are many Rabbis, activist groups and societies around the world dedicated to doing so; some are more successful than others. However, even trying to do so is a major mitzva. Short of breaking the law, consenting to a Get or helping a spouse who needs one is no less a religious obligation than praying, attending shul on Yom Kippur, going to a Passover seder, keeping kosher, honouring your parents, or refraining from committing adultery or stealing.

Torah's dictate to assist victimized spouse

In Biblical times, before going off to war, men would divorce their wives with the intention of remarrying them upon their return. The reason? If such a husband was killed and his body could not be found, then his wife became an agunah and could never remarry or even socialize. In today's world the grim pictures of observant Jews scrounging around for body parts and identification after a terrorist attack in Israel (or New York City) has a practical, if morbid, meaning. These Jews do so out of love for their fellow Jews, committing marvellous acts of kindness (chesed). They are trying to find solid evidence of a spouse's death. Without such evidence, it becomes difficult for the surviving spouse to remarry or even to socialize under Jewish or Israeli law! The life of the spouse who is left behind can become a living hell, well after the period of mourning ends, especially if she is observant and careful to follow Jewish law.

Physical evidence of death becomes crucial

Unlike the case in secular law, without such physical evidence the surviving spouse may not be able to obtain, from a rabbinical Court, a declaration that her husband died. In Canadian and American law one can obtain such a declaration if a spouse "disappears" and cannot be found after a prescribed period of time — usually seven years. Only then can the surviving spouse remarry or, in many cases, claim life insurance proceeds.

If a man wishes to consent to a Get, he must appear before a properly convened Jewish Court. There he instructs a scribe (trained for this purpose) to write the Bill of Divorce or Get. The wife is then asked to receive the Get and the husband deposits it in her hand to effect the termination of their marriage, duly witnessed.

Although the Rabbis prefer that both spouses be present at the Get proceedings, as per standard procedure, either spouse may choose not to physically appear; some are too nervous, embarrassed or angry. Either spouse may instead send a representative or messenger to the Jewish Court. Such a person is called a "shaliach". This shaliach stands in the spouse's shoes at the Get ceremony, so long as he has been properly instructed to do so. The parties' divorce is no less effective in law, whether or not a shaliach is employed in this fashion. (When using such messengers there are many technical rules. One must consult with a Rabbi trained in the area of Jewish divorce to know how and when a shaliach can be used. In Toronto, I suggest that readers contact Rabbi M. Ochs at 416-781-9676 for any such information or other questions about Jewish divorce.)

The valour of "Gershon", stuck on the 100th floor of the World Trade Centre just before it collapsed, will now become clear. According to a recent special edition of Toronto's Young Jewish Quarterly and other reports, Gershon's last moments in this world transpired as follows.

What would we do, moments from death?

Gershon was a "Torah" Jew whose younger life evolved in a Yeshiva. He lived his life according to Jewish law. In his final moments, as the building trembled, people around him either jumped off the building, screamed hysterically or collapsed in anguish. But Gershon did none of those things. Instead, his thoughts turned towards the love he had for his wife and the dictates of the Torah. As the smoke billowed about him, and the building shook with its impending collapse, Gershon calmly dialed his friend Nachum. Despite the fact that he was literally seconds away from his own death, Gershon had the selfless presence of mind to realize that the chances of his body being found and identified would be slim, leaving his wife forever unable to remarry or to socialize — an agunah for life. So he called Nachum and asked him to be his shaliach or messenger / representative and to give his wife a Get — his consent to a Jewish divorce.

Moments later, the World Trade Centre collapsed.

It would be obscene to draw moral lessons from the horror of what happened to the twin towers. Only God knows why bad things happen to good people.

But if Gershon could displace his fear of death by following this mitzva to give a Get in his last few seconds, how much greater is our responsibility to reach out and help the agunah? How much greater the onus on us, who stand on solid ground, without fear of imminent death, to give or receive a Get if we are separated from our spouse? To follow the Torah? To remember to express love for our spouse every day and perhaps every minute of every day, because it could be our last? To love our spouse more than ourself?

How much greater is our responsibility to avoid divorce altogether — to respect and preserve the bond that we too often come to take for granted?

May we all revere Gershon's memory and act in the wake of his inspiration.

YMCA seeks changes in pro-Palestinian Web site

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — YMCA Canada is calling on the World Alliance of YMCAs to drop 38 Internet links to Palestinian and Israeli Web sites from its home page.

The World Alliance Web site (www.ymca.int) as it is now constituted fails to present an evenhanded perspective on the Middle East conflict, said Silvana Anania, director of international development & relations for YMCA Canada.

In a letter to Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, Anania notes that YMCA Canada's national board had recently communicated its concerns about the World Alliance Web site to the Geneva-based organization.

"This letter (to the World Alliance) outlined our disagreement with the changes that were made to the Web site and that a 'balanced' perspective has not been achieved through the inclusion of new groups," Anania told Adler.

YMCA Canada "proposed a set of criteria including a focus on organizations and Web sites that promote peace, dialogue and reconciliation, as well as Web sites of YMCAs working in the region," her letter continues.

Anania told The CJN that a task force consisting of representatives of YMCAs from around the world will hold a conference call within the next week or two to discuss the Web site and the work of Ys serving Palestinian refugees. She expected the World Alliance to act on the task force's recommendations.

YMCA Canada has been engaged in a running battle with the World Alliance ever since it was alerted nine months ago to a one-sided report on the Palestinian/Israeli conflict that was posted on the organization's Web site.The report blames Israel alone for the violence of the ongoing intifadah.

World Alliance president Martin Vogler explained at the time that the organization's position on the conflict "is similar to the positions of many organizations...The international community broadly takes the view the Palestinians are the real victims of the ongoing tensions and lack basic and legitimate rights to a homeland and to live in dignity."

Spokespersons for Canadian and American Ys argued the World Alliance should remain neutral on international political conflicts. They raised their concerns at a meeting of the World Alliance's executive committee last April in Dakar, Senegal.

The World Alliance responded by adding a disclaimer to the Web site that the report did not represent the position of the organization's member groups.

It also added 38 links to various Web sites – only one of which might be considered uncritical of Israeli policy (prior to that, a single link to a Palestinian Web site was offered).

Twelve of the sites are designated as "Palestinian organizations," while 10 are described as Israeli in origin. In addition, six "Palestinian-Israeli organizations," five sites listed as "women's organizations" and five more "U.S. organizations" were added to the World Alliance's Web site.

At the time, Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Harold Brief called the changes "unbelievable...It's an absolute obscenity."

Adler discounted suggestions the World Alliance had taken YMCA Canada's concerns seriously.

"What you've got in essence is a propaganda machine with linkages that continue the propaganda. I don't think that's appropriate for the World Alliance," he said.

Adler suggested the World Alliance should stick to providing social services of an apolitical nature.

Kolel Esh Dat to honour 7 women

TORONTO — The E.D Fund, supporter of Kolel Esh Dat in Israel, will honour seven women at its gala celebration, to be held Nov. 6 at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto.

Kolel Esh Dat, located in B'nei Brak, was founded and is still supervised by Rabbi Tanchum Binyamin Becker. As well as housing Kolel families, it includes a synagogue, a mikvah, a rabbinical seminary and a publishing house.

The E.D. Fund has declared this year the Year of the Woman, and is honouring the seven women, Freda Barenholtz, Toby Burak, Bashe Kerzner, Ruth Ross, Blanche Schwartz, Anne Weinbaum and Lillyann Goldstein-Wiener, whose lives "have been dedicated to the objectives of love of God, love of Torah and love of the Jewish people," say dinner organizers.

Terrorism 'defining feature of the 21st century'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The war against terrorism was described last week as the chief problem of our time.

Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, predicted that it will be "the defining feature of the 21st century."

In a hard-hitting speech under the auspices of UJA Federation, he reminded the audience that it is also "our war."

Referring to the military campaign launched by the United States and its allies on Oct. 7 against Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda network in Afghanistan, Hoenlein said that the dangers posed by the forces of Islamic fundamentalism will be the "pre-eminent problem" of our time.

Hoenlein, one of the most powerful Jewish figures in the United States, warned of it long before Sept. 11, the day Arab hijackers affiliated with bin Laden crashed commercial airliners into New York City's World Trade Center and destroyed it.

Saying that the war against terrorism is universal, he said it is more dangerous than the now-won struggle against communism.

Al Qaeda, he observed, is an interlocking movement with members around the world, and it is backed by sovereign states and what he termed "Saudi millionaires."

"This is a global danger. These are not rag-tag groups. Don't underestimate their capabilities."

Speaking of "a clash of cultures" between the West and Islamic extremism, Hoenlein hastened to add that the war on terrorism is not directed at Islam.

In a veiled reference to countries like Syria and Iraq, which are said to sponsor terrorism, he declared, "This war can't end with bin Laden, or it will fail. We have to root out the problem, or it will grow worse."

Warning that Iraq and Iran are on the verge of acquiring a nuclear capability, Hoenlein said he expected Hamas and Islamic Jihad to be placed on a U.S. list of terrorist groups.

Turning to a related topic, Hoenlein scolded the United States for having exerted pressure on Israel in recent weeks.

He suggested that Washington was making demands on Israel so as to appease Arab members of the anti-Taliban coalition.

The war against terrorism, he noted, should not be prosecuted at Israel's expense.

"You can't fight it by asking Israel to become a victim."

The recent assertion by the Bush administration that it supports the establishment of a Palestinian state was poorly timed because it was perceived by Arab states as a reward for their services to the coalition, Hoenlein said.

He criticized American calls for an "immediate" Israeli withdrawal from Area A, fully controlled by the Palestinian Authority under the Oslo accords.

Israel stormed into several Palestinian towns after the assassination of Rechavam Ze'evi, the Israeli minister of tourism. The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine claimed responsibility for the murder.

If the United States can go after bin Laden thousands of miles away from its shores, Israel has the right to track down terrorists in its own backyard, Hoenlein pointed out.

"Israel sees itself as being subjected to double standards. You can't ask Israel to sacrifice its future for [Arab] partners who aren't contributing and won't be there when we need them."

Lest he be misunderstood, Hoenlein observed that the Bush administration does not intend to sacrifice Israel's vital interests.

Bin Laden, he said, is using the Palestinians for his own ends. "He doesn't care about the Palestinians, and never did."

Nonetheless, bin Laden and his cohorts ultimately seek Israel's destruction.

Hoenlein characterized the recent anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, during which Zionism was branded as a racist creed, as "a wakeup call."

Durban was a "true expression" of the war on Jews. And it will affect future generations of Jews, "your children's and grandchildren's lives."

Malcolm Hoenlein

In summing up, Hoenlein reiterated that the war against terrorism "is our battle, whether it's in New York or Toronto."

Manley's unworthy, problematic comments

Just before his departure for the Middle East last Friday, Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley gave an interview to the Ottawa Citizen which, if accurately quoted, will set back rather than advance the attempt to find a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The substance of his remarks was woefully flawed; the tone of his remarks was inexcusably patronizing.

In his obsequious efforts to placate the different terrorist-supporting, terrorist-training, terrorist-funding members of the U.S.-led coalition against terrorists, Manley differentiated between the terrorism that strikes continuously against Israel and the terrorism that struck against the United States on Sept.11.

The report cites Manley as saying the use of violence for political objectives cannot be condoned, "no matter where it occurs." But then in his very next breath, he provides the enemies of Israel with the very condonation they themselves proclaim to their followers and to the world as both reason and justification for the murder of Israelis and Jews.

"Whatever else you might say about Sept. 11, I'm not aware that it was a claim for some kind of territory on Manhattan Island. These are very different situations."

The "claim [by the Palestinians] for territory" is sufficient reason, in Manley's mind, to draw a distinction between the frenzied, religiously based hatred that leads to the slaughter of innocents in Israel and the equally frenzied, religiously based hatred that led to the recent slaughter of innocents in the U.S.

The story in the Citizen also reported that Manley would tell Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon that a phased withdrawal by the IDF from the West Bank towns recently re-entered was simply "not good enough."

"Mr. Arafat needs to be able to claim some progress on peace negotiations," the Citizen attributes to Manley. But it was Arafat who halted peace negotiations almost 16 months ago, who then gave the orders to recommit to violence against Israel, who released Islamic radicals from their detention, who instructed his media and his schools to propagate naked hatred against Israel and Jews, who plays the duplicitous, double game of saying one thing to westerners but another thing to his own people, and who tells the U.S. administration he is reining in his forces while he tells his forces shooting at Gilo Saturday night "to continue fighting, fighting, determinedly and forcefully."

Manley's hectoring at Israel seems naive or cruelly insensitive in the extreme. Either way, his opinions are unworthy and wholly problematic.

He squanders the moral capital Canada might lend in helping to resolve the conflict.

Concordia reputation being ruined

Over the past year, the Concordia Student Union (CSU) has gotten Concordia in the news – but always for the wrong reasons. The CSU's handbook is only the latest of these events.

The handbook, titled Uprising, is a pro-Palestinian tool that tells everyone to take arms in an intifadah for revolution and to burn the Canadian flag. It refers to May 15, 1948, the date of the creation of the State of Israel, as Al-Nakba, meaning the "catastrophe." It also contains an article called Arabaphobia, which accuses B'nai Brith Canada of hatemongering.

Concordia was in the news this past August when two students, Laith Marouf and Tom Keefer, were expelled; Marouf, the CSU's vice-president (internal), was caught spray-painting pro-Palestinian graffiti and allegedly assaulted Concordia security agents.

Before that, the CSU held a general assembly (and referendum later on) to put pressure on the Canadian government to force Israel to withdraw from territories it captured in 1967 and to sever diplomatic and economic relations with Israel.

This sort of thing is simply ruining Concordia's reputation. Whenever someone hears about Concordia in the news or thinks of studying there, they'll think, "Why should I go there? I could be in fear of my life when the CSU is circulating material which incites hatred and violence."

Many Jewish students here feel very threatened right now because of how pro-Palestinian the CSU has become. No one should be under that fear – not Jews, not anyone!

Hopefully, students will stand up against this pro-Palestinian propaganda and turn the university into a place of learning once again.

Poet responds to critic

Carly Steinman (CJN, letters to the editor, Oct. 25) objects to my use of the word "choose" in my poem Palestinians. ("Rather than getting on with life/They choose poverty, squalor, endless strife.")

The sad fact is that the Palestinians chose to reject Ehud Barak's peace offer – an offer described by many objective observers as generous. Should the Palestinians ever choose to form an amicable relationship with the people of Israel, their standard of living would undoubtedly improve.

U.S. policy wrong

It seems hard to believe that after a year and a half of blatant deception by the Palestinian Authority (PA), the Israeli left is still clamouring about leaving the unity government while Europe and the United States exert even more pressure on Israel to lay down their arms in order to be slaughtered slowly in a war of attrition. Hopefully the irony is not lost on those who carpet-bomb Afghanistan and tell the residents of Gilo to sit quietly while mortars rain down from Beit Jala.

The United States told Israel to "take risks for peace" and the late Yitzhak Rabin took on faith that his U.S. insurance broker would cover them if the risk backfired. Well, the morally necessary Oslo experiment has backfired and our insurance broker is insolvent!

As opposed to standing by Israel, a war-torn nation yearning desperately for normalcy and peace, the United States has applied even greater pressure in a State Department-sponsored lie regarding the reality on the ground. Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has not "re-conquered," and thankfully, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres seems to be behind him this time saying all the right things.

As current minister without portfolio Dan Meridor noted when he left the former prime minister Ehud Barak's coalition, the peace process is not about what an Israeli leader will or will not do as a matter of policy; it's about what PA Chairman Yasser Arafat chooses to do. Arafat chose war; he has been met by only mild criticism while seeking the protection of the very accords he never respected. How transparent.

How pathetic that the democracy – Israel – is being isolated and pressured while the tin-pot dictator is being coddled. It seems odd that the United States cannot discern the pattern: support Israel's fundamental right to exist and Israelis will feel secure and able to risk much for a sense of normalcy. Abandon, isolate and pressure Israel and you will empower those who seek her destruction.

Let's hope Sharon and Peres stay the course, recognizing that a ceasefire is worthless unless we can come up with a tenable answer to Arafat's decision to foment hate and run from reconciliation.

Selective Muslim response

Since the destruction and devastation that occurred on Sept. 11, daily newspapers have published articles and letters to the editor from Muslim religious leaders in Canada and elsewhere condemning the terrorists and disassociating mainstream Islam from such fiends. Arab political leaders around the world have condemned terrorism in general and the attacks of Sept. 11 in particular.

I have no doubt as to the sincerity of these writers and spokespersons and no doubt that Osama bin Laden and his types do not adhere to the basic tenets and beliefs of the majority of Muslims throughout the world. Nonetheless, I have this one nagging thought. Where were all these voices when suicide bombers from Gaza and the West Bank murdered and maimed innocent civilians in Israel? Instead, blame was attributed to Israel's "occupation," with urgings that Israel show restraint in retaliating. I wonder what the reaction of the Muslim world would have been had the assault of Sept. 11 taken place in Tel Aviv and all those killed were Jews. Would there have been condemnations and urging of restraints or a unified campaign vowing to stamp out terrorism? I wonder.

Jewish reflections on war and peace

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

Though Judaism recognizes both "a time of war and a time of peace" (Ecclesiastes 3:8), what requires clarification is how the conflicting values of war and peace interact with each other. With a long conflict expected in Afghanistan, it is the proper time to reflect on the Jewish attitude towards war.

Any Jewish discussion of war must begin with peace. Peace is Judaism's highest aspiration. The Midrash says the entire Torah is based on the value of peace (Bamidbar Rabbah 11:7). The obligation to seek peace is of a higher order than ritual observances. It notes that peace is the only commandment that the Torah demands us to actively seek, that a person must "search for peace and pursue it" (Psalms 34:15; Vayikra Rabbah 9:9).

For the sake of peace, we are allowed to compromise on other moral and religious values. One may lie in order to prevent strife (Yebamot 65b), and in one instance, a section of the Torah may be erased in order to preserve marital peace (see Rambam Chanukah 4:14).

In fact, one must bend over backwards to make peace. It is a mark of piety if a person accepts insults quietly and does not respond (Shabbat 88b). In general, grace and mercy are divine attributes, meant to be emulated by man (Shabbat 133b).

How, then, do we apply this value in the face of aggression? Some argue that pacifism is the only appropriate response. Pacifism has the advantage of being uncompromising, categorical and absolute. Pacifists love peace without sullying their hands with violent actions.

As Brian Orend points out, there are two types of pacifism. One is consequentialist, and assumes that in long run, the world will be more peaceful if people choose to remain passive in the face of aggression. A second argument is moral, which claims that violence is forbidden no matter what the circumstances are.

Consequentialists posit that if you defend yourself with violence, you perpetuate an endless cycle of violence. Non-violent protest is the only way to break that cycle. According to this view, attacking Afghanistan will create future violent reactions; the United States would be better off taking the high ground, and by remaining non-violent, teach the aggressors the value of peace.

This view is not new; indeed, some pacifists trace it to a passage in Flavius Josephus' The Jewish War (Book II, Chapter 16). In a speech by Agrippa, (the Jewish king during the revolt of 66 CE), he exhorts the crowd not to revolt against the Roman governor Gessius Florus, saying: "Now nothing so much damps the force of strokes as bearing them with patience; and the quietness of those who are injured diverts the injurious persons from afflicting."

Agrippa assumes the Jews will receive goodwill if they remain meek, passive and useful. Indeed, the Talmud (Gittin 57a) considers the Jewish revolt a tragic mistake. The tactic of shveig shtill (stay quiet) was often used by Jews in anti-Semitic societies, where they found it best to offer complete co-operation to those in authority.

While the shveig shtill form of pacifism is a reasonable approach for a powerless group, it would seem absurd for a powerful nation like the United States to be non-violent, allowing all who attack it to do so with impunity. Yet pacifists argue that even world powers should embrace non-violence. They argue that non-violence, by virtue of its moral authority, can be successful, and note that Mahatma Gandhi succeeded in getting the British to leave India through non-violent protest.

However, Gandhi succeeded because he was opposing an empire tired and weakened after World War II, and one that had a tradition of respect for human rights. It would have been ineffective in other instances. For the six million Jews getting murdered in Europe, Gandhi had no practical advice. He advised Rabbi Leo Baeck, the leader of German Jewry during the Holocaust, that he should get all German Jews to commit mass suicide; this, he said, would focus the world's attention on Adolf Hitler's inhumanity. (To this Rabbi Baeck replied, "We Jews know that it is God's singular commandment, to live"). Non-violent protest would have done nothing to change Hitler's evil heart.

The second type of pacifism, moral pacifism, assumes that it is morally forbidden to use violence, even in self-defence. Many people are inspired by the Buddhist teachings of the Dalai Lama, who received the 1989 Nobel Peace Prize. Exiled from his homeland of Tibet, he still preaches a principled form of non-violence to his followers.

Others have based their moral pacifism on the New Testament. In Matthew 26:52, Jesus tells a disciple not to defend him against an enemy: "Then said Jesus unto him, Put up again thy sword into his place: for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." This can be construed as a prohibition against any violence, even in self-defence. Furthermore, in the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5:29), Jesus says: "but I say unto you, that ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." While many Christian authorities interpret these verses in other ways, there are Christian sects, such as the Mennonites and Anabaptists, who preach an uncompromising moral pacifism.

In the Jewish tradition, self-defence is a moral obligation. The Torah allows people to defend their property from a thief even if this will cause the conflict to escalate into a physical battle. If there is reason to assume that the thief will use lethal force to seize the property, the owner may use physical force, and even kill the thief if necessary to protect himself (Exodus 22:1, Sanhedrin 72a).

There are two rationales for allowing self-defence. The first is practical; without the ability to use lethal force to stop the actions of aggressors, anarchy would reign (Chinnuch 600). The second rationale challenges the moral assumptions of non-violence. It asserts that the life of the aggressor and the victim are not of equal value; if only one will survive, it is our obligation to make certain that it is the innocent person, the victim, who will survive (Cf. Rashi to Exodus 22:1). For this reason, the Jewish tradition considers pacifism in the face of aggression to be immoral. Refusing to fight evil is to be party to evil.

In the Sept. 26 Washington Post, Michael Kelly wrote: "No honest person can pretend that the groups that attacked America will, if let alone, not attack again... To not fight in this instance is to let the attackers live to attack and murder again; to be a pacifist in this instance is to accept and, in practice, support this outcome."

This is essentially the Jewish point of view – if you don't help the victim, you are an ally of the aggressor. If a person refuses to defend himself, he allows evil to triumph.

There are times, then, when we must make war. Yet even during times of war, Judaism obligates us to continue to love peace. We must never lose sight of the humanity of our enemies, and we must recognize that every death on the battlefield is tragic. The Talmud teaches us that on the night that the Egyptian army drowned in the Red Sea, the first true moment of freedom for the Jews fleeing Egypt, God refused to hear the angels sing their prayers, and said, "My creations are drowning in the sea, and you will sing songs?" (Megillah 10b). Every human is created in God's image, and every death is a tragedy.

Former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir was often quoted as saying she could forgive the Arab countries for killing Jewish children, but she could not forgive the Arab countries for making it necessary for Jews to kill Arab children. The warrior must mourn the deaths of his enemies, and never forget the value of life.

A soldier's love for peace will affect his wartime behaviour. War must be conducted in a just fashion. During wartime, soldiers must make every effort to avoid killing non-combatants. This concern with collateral damage is first found in Abraham's pleading with God to avoid killing any righteous citizens of Sodom. Abraham argued that even though God was destroying Sodom because it was a profoundly wicked city, justice demanded that God avoid killing any righteous individual while destroying the city.

The Torah even prohibits the destruction of trees in the vicinity of military attack (Deuteronomy 20:19). The rationale is, even in wartime, we must be careful never to destroy, and despite the violence inherent in battle, we must endeavour to preserve every living being, from humans to animals to trees (Chinnuch 630). Even during the chaos of wartime, a soldier must act with decency and morality.

A recent report in the New York Times (Aug. 31) illustrates this point. In August, Israeli troops entered Beit Jala to stop snipers from shooting into Gilo. Clyde Haberman visited Beit Jala after the Israeli troops withdrew. He found that in one apartment "soldiers apologized in a note that they left in the paws of a teddy bear. In slightly misspelled English, it said, 'We are truely sorry for the mess we made.'"

These soldiers understood that peace is Judaism's paramount value. They understood that we are always sorry about the mess and tragedy of war, and that all Jews wait desperately for the days when "they will beat their swords into plowshares... and no nation will lift up its sword against another nation" (Isaiah 2:4).

Opinions

God and the World Trade Center

Since the catastrophe on Sept. 11, I have been asked on more than one occasion, "Where was God when the terrorists not only killed thousands of people, but brought the American economy and the economy of the whole world to a standstill, and brought us close to another world war, albeit in different shape?"

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

If indeed this were to happen in the near future, the toll in human lives would far exceed anything that history has ever known. This potential for an immense number of casualties automatically reminds us of the question: "Where was God when the World Trade Center was bombed?" And we still ask: "Where was God during the Holocaust?"

I have dealt with this subject on various occasions, but I believe that in view of the happenings of Sept. 11, it is important to examine it again. It is important for us to arrive at a belief in God that we can make our own in every respect, so that we will be able to pray, untouched by creeping doubts.

As I understand the Torah, God divested Himself of one essential aspect of His power when He created humanity and gave it freedom of choice. That is what the Torah affirms when it has God saying to us: "Choose between life and death," which means that to do the right thing or the wrong thing depends on our decision and not on God. If we choose good, we will be favoured with the blessings of life, but if we choose evil, the consequences will be according to the choice.

This is the theology of the Torah. Look at the first time that God gives human beings a framework, reflected in the first chapters of the Torah. In the tale of the Garden of Eden, Adam and Eve are warned not to eat from the Tree of Knowledge, but they choose to disregard the command, paying the price by being expelled from Paradise.

Not long after comes the tale of Cain and Abel. Cain is ready to kill his brother when God warns him to suppress his evil inclination. Cain does not listen and slays his brother. It was Cain's choice, not God's.

Ever since, we humans have been both privileged and burdened by the responsibility of exercising our freedom responsibly – with all the consequences arising from our choice.

Begging to differ?

In France, it's Je pense donc je suis. In Israel, in a Jewish twist on the Cartesian approach, it's "I think, therefore I am... opinionated." To speak one's mind in Israel is to reaffirm one's existence. It's a rare question, especially one about current events, that elicits no comment for an answer.

Not to harbour and express a point of view on the issues of the day is virtually unheard of. It's as if such reticence were an unadulterated shame, a sign of inadequacy.

The other evening at my in-laws' in Jerusalem with various relatives around the dinner table, talk quickly turned – as it invariably does – to what's been in the news lately. It didn't take long before the conversation climbed in decibels and opinions swirled in all directions like a desert storm. The debate eventually subsided by the end of the meal but everyone remained firmly entrenched in their opinions.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

That's the way it often is at any gathering of more than one person in Israel. True to the tired, old joke about two Jews and three opinions, this country is one big op-ed page come to life. Israelis are nothing if not highly opinionated and only too happy to share their editorial position with you. They get their point across loud and clear, in your face if necessary, whether in heated conversations at the local café, in frequent protest demonstrations, on ubiquitous bumper stickers or on TV and the radio.

What are they so worked up over? There is never – and I mean never – a shortage of issues about which to wax passionately. Some are perennial; others spring from recent developments. The list is endless.

Yes or no: should Prime Minster Ariel Sharon deploy Israeli soldiers in Palestinian-controlled areas?

Yes or no: should Foreign Minister Shimon Peres meet with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat while violence against Israel continues?

Yes or no: should Israel release hundreds of Arab security prisoners as demanded by Hezbollah in exchange for four Israelis kidnapped by the Lebanon-based organization last year?

Yes or no: should the government dismantle new Jewish settlement outposts established in the past year in the West Bank?

Yes or no: should there be a greater separation between synagogue and state and official recognition of non-Orthodox Judaism?

Yes or no: are Israel's so-called "targeted killings" of Palestinian terrorists effective or are they part of an immoral policy that simply increases Palestinian desire for revenge?

Yes or no: should the government end the special status of haredi men who neither share in the national burden of military duty nor do community service?

Yes or no: should Israel evacuate settlements in the Gaza Strip in the interests of a peace agreement with the Palestinians?

All of these, of course, are matters of no small consequence. Many are life and death issues not easily reduced to yes or no answers. Most concern all citizens in some way and as such command great attention. Such loaded subjects are not easily avoided in Israel.

Any day of the week, you need only turn on the TV or radio for a fresh installment of intense national debate – on news programs, live coverage of Knesset sessions or political talk shows. One of the most popular, called Politica, brings together pundits, politicians and other assorted concerned parties to tackle questions linked to current events. More often than not it turns into a cacophony of conflicting voices.

Living in Israel, you often find yourself in situations resembling Politica. There are times when you're left dizzy by the surfeit of opinions coming at you and the Gordian knots they represent. When you are in such a discussion, you must choose how to respond. Do you beg to differ or defer judgment? Like with so many other things, it depends on the time, place and the company you're in – and the issue at hand.

Sometimes I just sit back, take in all the perspectives and consider which ones seem the most cogent. It's not unusual that seemingly contradictory opinions spanning the political spectrum all seem to make sense to me.

That's when things get really confusing. That's when I go to the computer and write another column for the CJN page called Opinions.

The corruption that breeds Islamic rage

Most of the excuses for the rage that fuels support for Islamic terrorist attacks against the United States and the West are nonsense, including the link to the Arab-Israeli conflict. For the past 53 years, much of the Arab world has only provided lip-service in support of the Palestinians. Rather, the hatred of Israel in countries like Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Iraq are reflection of the primary causes underlying this fury. Israel is seen as an agent of America and the West (for this purpose, Jews and Christians are lumped into the same category), and, except in propaganda meant largely for external consumption, the tiny Jewish State is not a root cause of this extremism.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Other explanations focus on Islam to explain the support for terrorists such as Osama bin Laden, and for groups such as Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad. However, these factors do not explain the rise of militant fundamentalist and violent Islam in the past three decades. While some aspects of Islam are particularly violent, this religion, like others, has numerous branches, and in many places, Muslims live peacefully next to their non-Muslim neighbours.

The most important factors feeding hatred of the West and the demonstrations in support of bin Laden can be found in more banal political and socio-economic conditions. Most of the Islamic world is ruled by a small, corrupt elite, which has plundered the economy and used brutality to suppress its own citizens. The masses are condemned to lives of abject poverty with no hope for the future. The contrast with images of the plenty and freedom of the West seen on television and in advertisements creates the jealousy that fuels support for terror.

Saddam Hussein may have reached new levels of cruelty against the Iraqi people, but his "leadership style," based on murder, torture and intimidation, is not fundamentally different from that of Hafez (and now Basher) Assad in Syria, the Taliban rulers in Afghanistan, or Arafat's corrupt dictatorship in the Palestinian Authority. In Egypt and Pakistan, the military and economic elites have used repression to preserve their power and destroy potential rivals, while enriching themselves by maintaining a failed economic system that keeps most of the population very poor and filled with anger and resentment.

Many years ago, first Europe and then the United States accepted this dangerous situation by supporting the corrupt but generally pro-western dictatorships and monarchies. In the major oil exporting countries, such as Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Iran (during the reign of the Shah) these policies were seen as insuring both access to petroleum and also as a means of controlling prices. In addition, Egypt and Pakistan were useful allies in the Cold War, and the United States provided the military elites in these countries with plenty of weapons and money, while keeping away from involvement in "domestic issues."

As a result, as resentment against these extremely repressive and corrupt governments increased, the hostility directed at America and the West also mounted. With all other forms of dissent and protest barred, radical Islam became the only alternative. Among Palestinians, Hamas gained support by providing basic social services and a sense of participation that challenged Arafat's dictatorship. Bin Laden began his career as a terrorist and gained a following by challenging the corrupt Saudi monarchy. Later, he joined with radical Islamic forces seeking to overthrow the Egyptian government, and then spread out across the Middle East.

In the short term, in order to defeat the forces of radical Islam, the United States and the West may have little choice but to work and continue support for the corrupt and closed regimes in countries like Saudi Arabia and Egypt. However, in the longer term, these policies – which contradict the most basic principles of western democracy – must change, and the forces of freedom and hope that exist in all human societies must be released. This is the best way to end the scourge of terrorism and the support it receives in the Islamic world.

The Kirshner File

From emancipation to destruction in Germany

Shortly after the establishment of the Leo Baeck Institute in New York City, the chair of its board proposed that a comprehensive English-language history of Jews in German-speaking countries be written. The project died, but was revived in 1986 by Lucy Dawidowicz and a group of like-minded scholars.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto.

Thanks to their initiative, Columbia University Press has published German-Jewish History in Modern Times, an impressive four-volume set written by a team of respected historians and edited by two of the leading scholars in the field, Michael Meyer and Michael Brenner. Concentrating on the period from 1600 to 1945, and covering such broad topics as the political and legal status of Jews and Jewish participation in those societies, its emphasis is on Germany and its leitmotif is the trajectory from emancipation to destruction.

Volume 1 encompasses the era from 1600 to 1780, but starts with a survey of the earliest Jewish settlements in what is now Germany. Clear documentary evidence suggests that Jews have lived continuously in Germany since the Carolingian Empire (800 C.E.) era.

From the rampant bloodshed of the Crusades to the baseless charges of ritual murder, the lot of Jews was never secure. Ostracized as outsiders, they were forced into moneylending. Throughout the Middle Ages, taxes extorted from Jews constituted the largest single segment of revenues flowing into royal coffers.

The writers also explore the devastating effects of the Thirty Years War (1618-1648) on Jewish communities, the rise of court Jews like Samuel Oppenheimer, the mercurial nature of Christian-Jewish relations, the tensions and conflicts within the Jewish community, the development of Hebrew printing presses, the emergence of the Enlightenment, and the movement for the civic emancipation of the Jews (spearheaded by Christian Wilhelm Dohm's landmark treatise, On the Improvement of the Civil Status of the Jews).

Taking the story up to Germany's unification in 1871, Volume 2 surveys the legal status of German Jews, which varied greatly from state to state. It also offers insights into the Toleration Edict, enacted in 1782 by the Habsburg monarchy. Anti-Semitism was deeply embedded in the German states, as the 1819 "Hep Hep" riots indicated. Nonetheless, the Jewish population in the German states climbed from 260,000 in 1816 to about 400,000 in 1848.

The scholarly study of Judaism (Wissenschaft des Judentums) is explored, as is the rise of Reform Judaism, whose chief proponent was Rabbi Abraham Geiger.

Conversions took a toll. Between 1800 and 1848, 5,000 Prussian Jews are estimated to have converted to Christianity. Two of these converts were Friedrich Julius Stahl, a major political thinker, and Heinrich Heine, the legendary poet.

As Jews were acculturated, they were integrated socially and professionally into German, Austrian and Czech society. But emancipation legislation, passed by 26 German states in the mid-19th century, was implemented by only five of them.

Volume 3, which ends in 1918 with Germany's defeat in World War I, highlights the relationship between the attainment of full civic rights by Jews and their gradual assimilation. With the introduction of civil marriage in the German Empire in 1875, Jews entered into mixed marriages with increasing frequency.

During this epoch, when Jewish entrepreneurs from Hermann Tietz to Adolf Jandorf founded the first department stores, Jews were increasingly drawn to occupations requiring a university education, and the middle-class Jewish family underwent a radical transformation.

In this period, Jews bumped up against occupational glass ceilings (no professing Jew, for example, could aspire to be an officer in the German army), while anti-Semitic political parties and racial anti-Semitism arose.

Influenced by a Viennese journalist named Theodor Herzl, Zionism came into vogue among a minority of Jewish intellectuals. For the vast majority of Jews, the allure of German culture was irresistible. Their contributions to society, from the arts to journalism, are richly chronicled here.

Volume 4, which begins with the Weimar Republic and concludes with the collapse of the Nazi regime, takes a reader on a turbulent ride. The social, religious and occupational structure of the Jewish community is analyzed, as is the Jewish economic elite. There is an illuminating sub-section on Jews in German and Austrian politics, as well as a lengthy analysis of the Jewish attachment to Germany and its culture.

In the final 200 pages, the doleful, oft-told chronicle of the Nazi dictatorship is rehashed in chapter and verse. By 1943, the Jewish community in Germany was extinct.

German-Jewish History in Modern Times, in sum, gives a reader a clear perspective of the long saga of German Jewry.

The second volume of Victor Klemperer's diary of the Nazi years, I Will Bear Witness (Random House, hard and soft cover), is a chilling, detached portrayal of daily life of Jews in Nazi Germany from 1942 until 1945.

A professor of Romance languages, he was a converted Jew who lived through World War II in Dresden with his non-Jewish wife. In terms of his values and sensibilities, Klemperer was a German to his fingertips. But to the Nazis, he was a Jew, pure and simple. He was spared the fate of deportation by dumb luck: the Allied firebombing of Dresden in the last months of the war.

I Will Bear Witness – which has been ably translated by Martin Chalmers – is a litany of minor and major tragedies, most of which take the form of humiliating restrictions systematically imposed by the regime on Jews.

On Feb. 6, 1942, he writes that Jews are forbidden to buy shaving soap. "Do they want to reintroduce the medieval Jew's beard by force?" Jews are then barred from purchasing cakes. By the spring of that year, they face yet more restrictions, not being allowed to store foodstuffs, enter railway stations, stand in queues or cycle on Sundays.

Be that as it may, Klemperer does not lose faith. "I am German and am waiting for the Germans to come back; they have gone to ground somewhere." But after reading Herzl's The Jewish State with "mixed feelings," he succumbs to despair. "I can no longer believe in the completely un-German character of National Socialism; it is homegrown, a malignant growth out of German flesh."

As 1942 winds down, his despondency deepens. "Everyone with whom we spent last New Year's Eve has been blotted out by murder, suicide and evacuation." To compound the misery, Klemperer, in October 1944, notes that "six to seven million Jews have been slaughtered (more exactly: shot and gassed)."

On a personal level, his experiences vary. Two young boys insult him on the street. "It is ever more difficult to endure all this humiliation," he observes on May 14, 1942. Yet on May 5, 1943, a worker offers to carry a heavy chest for him, and on April 22, 1945, a master joiner blasts the government for its cruel treatment of Jews in Berlin.

The cruelty of the regime is boundless. On Jan. 23, 1944, Klemperer reads the obituary of Horst-Siegfried Weigmann, a 24-year-old decorated soldier. He learns that his mother, a Jew, was arrested and sent to Theresienstadt.

In spare, dispassionate prose, Klemperer records the madness which gripped a nation.

Peter Gay, a professor of history emeritus at Yale University, has written an engaging memoir of growing up Jewish in Nazi Germany. As he acknowledges in My German Question (Yale), the early years of the new Nazi order were relatively benign for the Gays, who were thoroughly secular and assimilated Jews, indifferent to their Jewish origins. Even as the vise tightened, they refused to renounce their identity as Germans. "The Nazis had no right to impose their perversion of history and biology on us," he writes.

Gay's attitude changed after Kristallnacht. "I read it... as a catastrophe that deepened my rancor against Germany and Germans." In 1939, the Gays boarded the Iberia, a ship bound for Cuba. Regarding their stopover in Havana as temporary, they made plans to settle in the United States. But because his mother was ill and his father was her caregiver, Gay left Cuba in 1941 without his parents, his hatred of Germany undiminished.

For years, he was anti-German. "I would not even read German, a vengeful stance from which I was forced to retreat once I entered graduate school in 1946." But as he grew older, he concluded that he could not condemn a whole nation.

The History of Jews in Breslau has been published in German and in Polish by a Polish publishing house in Wroclaw, Wydawnictwo Dolnoslaskie. The author, Leszek Ziatkowski, has written an interesting account of a community in transition. Amply illustrated, it adds to our knowledge of German Jewry.

Jewish Life

The Jewish way: steady, daily

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The desperate crisis of meaning that often consciously and unconsciously envelops most westerners has morphed, if only briefly, into a new penchant for taking stock of existence in the wake of newspaper headlines of death and war. There is without question, a remarkably narcissistic bent to this new fashion of seriousness, as though all along we haven't been surrounded constantly by horrific reminders of brutality, tyrannical oppression and even holy wars of one kind or another. The only difference is that now, in relatively smaller terms, the problem is on our shores.

I do not recall the slightest whiff of existential anxiety or serious probing into issues like justice and evil when 800,000 Rwandans were decimated within 90 days back in 1994. As a student of mine remarked with dismay and disapproval, "Most Jews pass that one off as a bunch of black primitives slaughtering one another. Nothing to lose much sleep over." In retrospect, this seems accurate to me, once one sheds the requisite self-righteous protests. (No one wants to publicly cop to being indifferent to mass suffering, especially when such passivity is linked to a vaguely muffled bigotry.)

I find myself growing increasingly appalled at the paradoxical combination of empty tolerance and a disturbing narrowness with which many of our children in the Jewish community view the world. There is either the usual brand of unreflective relativism, in which all cultures lay equal claim to their traditions and in which no judgment can be passed on anyone, including the brutal practices of other governments; or an equally unreflective and tawdry racism, in which the spiritual and cultural aspirations of other faiths, including Christianity and Islam are ridiculed solely because they are different – that is, they are not us. Jewish education in its more fearful guises has not been particularly inspiring in this process, often falling back on time-honoured dismissals of things not Jewish, the better to close our eyes to the complexity of why God constructed such a variegated world.

"A thoughtful life is not premised on an experience of catastrophe, except for the exceedingly thoughtless. There are states of happiness that are not states of stupidity. We should not have to choose between being imbeciles and being mourners." With these words written in The New Republic, Leon Wieseltier caustically lays out a seminal truth which Judaism has understood for millennia, and which resonates all the more against the backdrop of recent events.

We do not suddenly decide to "get serious about life" because of frightening acts of evil. We do not oscillate between unquenchable distraction when things are going swimmingly, and unfocused and utterly hapless attitudes of gravity when a crisis hits. The Jewish way is the path of steady daily mindfulness, organized around the growth of the soul, family and community commitments, the devotion to Torah, the worship of God. It is precisely the fact that this regimen continues unabated in good times and bad, and is not in the slightest way contingent on the latest media preoccupation or societal fad, that has allowed Judaism to endure on the wings of a transcendent spiritual message. Never was that message more appropriate than now.

Are we now a value-free country?

By HENRY SREBRNIK

Guest Voice

This strange war against terrorism is now a few weeks old. Its fronts range from the skies above Afghanistan to mailboxes across America. American warplanes bomb and simultaneously drop food packets; after all, Washington claims to be fighting, not the Afghani people and their state, but the extremist Taliban regime and the shadowy al Qaeda fanatics with training camps in that country. The latter, organized in faceless and nameless cells and networks, appear to be sending out anthrax spores, most probably from within the United States itself.

Meanwhile, as police forces in Canada and the United States continue to arrest alleged Islamist terrorists, many of whom, it turns out, may even hold citizenship in one or the other country, it becomes apparent how much damage has been done by those who think multiculturalism and anti-racism are synonymous with total political relativism. Many people have come to assume that North America should be a value-free zone in terms of national cultures and all that those embody.

In the past, states stood for certain ideological and political values and people who emigrated to them assimilated to those basic tenets. Countries did not as a matter of routine accept it as perfectly normal to allow entry to people who espoused the very doctrines that those states were battling.

It would have been amazing to discover supporters of the great Muslim leader Saladin living in Christian Europe during the Crusades; the reverse, finding followers of King Richard the Lion Heart in the Muslim Middle East, would have been equally astounding. More recently, we would have been astonished had we found followers of Adolf Hitler, perhaps even his close relatives, in Calgary, Toronto, Chicago or Dallas during World War II.

In other words, states demanded and expected some sort of commitment, in terms of acceptance of a certain way of life, from their citizens. In western countries, that implied an adherence to the minimal standards of pluralist democracy.

In Canada, alas, that seems no longer the case. There are those among us who confuse our embrace of ethnic and cultural diversity with tolerance for political doctrines that justify prejudice, bigotry, even mass murder.

Such Canadians believe that they are perfectly within their rights to publicly support even the most extreme Islamists, advocates of military jihad, and have the effrontery to denounce those of us who find this unacceptable as "racists" – although how a political doctrine such as Islamism can be confused with ethnic identity or skin colour is itself a mystery.

No one in Canada, to my knowledge, is casting aspersions at Afro-Caribbean Protestants, Hindus and Sikhs from India, Hispanic Catholics, or Middle Eastern Armenians, Copts and Maronites, for the simple reason that no members of these faiths have announced open warfare against western values. Nor have there been any blanket condemnations of the Islamic faith per se.

Yet such tolerance is, for those who oppose our battle against Osama bin Laden and the Taliban, insufficient. They reject as untenable the very notion that someone might be what used to be known as a "fifth columnist" – a supporter of an enemy state or ideology. In their opinion, western states are now required to accept all values and ideological points of view, including even those whose goals include the very destruction of our societies.

Compare these two statements, made on the same day in mid-October: The first is from Mullah Mohammed Omar, the Taliban leader, who issued a defiant public response to the American bombings in Afghanistan: "We are not afraid of dying and we should die as Muslims. We have fought against the Russians and this is another jihad against infidels."

The second is by Gov. Gen. Adrienne Clarkson, as she bid farewell to Canadian forces leaving for duty in the Arabian Sea. No matter what, she declared, we must remain a "multicultural, immigrant, aboriginal and bilingual community."

While bin Laden and the Taliban, confident in their faith, have no problem identifying their enemy as Christians and Jews, secular Canada feels it must shroud its own objectives in a euphemistic fog of bromides and reiterate its commitment to be all things to all peoples. (Are we really fighting this war to safeguard our two official languages?) So we go to war, not against a virulent and anti-Semitic strain of fascism, but against terrorism, lest we be accused of cultural insensitivity or "Islamophobia!"

In 1940, did former British prime minister Winston Churchill identify "bomber aircraft pilots" or the Nazis as the enemy? During the Cold War, did the western alliance defend freedom against unnamed forces of "revolution" or Soviet Communism? Being frank about the identity of the ideological foe surely did not make them "anti-German" or "anti-Russian." Have we now reached the point that, even when we are at war, opposition to Islamism is an animus that dare not speak its name?

Jewish Life

Jewish Books and the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

We're not called the People of the Book for nothing. Every November, Jews crowd into book fairs to celebrate Jewish Book Month. Though using the Internet can't match the thrill of meeting your favourite author in person, you can use it to read up on what's new in Jewish books, browse through the catalogues of the best Jewish libraries in the world and even strike up a conversation with that author through e-mail. Today, a look at Jewish book resources on the Web.

A page called The Popular Arabic Literature of the Jews explains that Arabic has been spoken by Jews since pre-Islamic times. Stories were often written using Hebrew characters to represent the Arabic sounds. The site has a dozen tales, poems and other Jewish writings written in Arabic and translated into English [http://www.uwm.edu/~corre/judeo-arabic.html].

No survey of Jewish fiction on the Internet would be complete without a look at works in Yiddish. The best place to start is Mendele: the Forum for Yiddish Literature and Language [http://shakti.trincoll.edu/~mendele/]. The site is named after Mendele the Bookseller, the beloved fictional character of Sholem-Yankev Abramovitsh (1836-1917). Its mailing list archives contain lively exchanges about Yiddish literature and language. When you visit, don't miss the gallery for pictures of some of the greats like Sholem Ash, Sholem Aleichem and Isaac Bashevis Singer, winner of the 1978 Nobel Prize in Literature. (You can also read Singer's final interview online at Salon.com [http://www.salon.com/books/int/1998/04/cov_si_28int.html]).

Are you trying to track down a treasured Jewish book or looking for someone to publish the great Jewish novel you've just written? The Association of Jewish Book Publishers' home page is great for the names, addresses and links to its many members such as New Hampshire's Milah Press and New York's UAHC Press [http://www.avotaynu.com/ajbp.html]. The Jewish Publishing News, published three or four times a year, lists what's happening in the industry, including book tours [http://www.olswanger.com/].

The Bibliomaven Web site is a one-stop listing of some of the great Jewish libraries of the world [http://www.bibliomaven.com/]. You can visit the Denmark Royal Library's Centre for Orientalia and Judaica or riffle through the online catalogues of Brandeis University Libraries [http://www.library.brandeis.edu/], the Jewish Theological Seminary [http://www.jtsa.edu/library/] and Jerusalem's Hebrew University [http://sites.huji.ac.il/jnul/aleph3.html]. The all-volunteer Association of Jewish Libraries has members in 25 countries [http://www.jewishlibraries.org/ajlweb/about.htm].

There are many lists of Jewish writing on the Internet. Malka Schaps, a professor at the mathematics and computer science department at Bar Ilan University in Israel, has compiled an annotated list of Orthodox Jewish fiction works in English and Hebrew [http://www.cs.biu.ac.il/~mschaps/bibliography.html]. The Jewish American Literature Research home page has a selected bibliography of contemporary Jewish American authors [http://www.ngc.peachnet.edu/Academic/Arts_Let/LangLit/dproyal/jewish.htm].

While some authors crave privacy, others love to maintain a connection to their readers. Naomi Ragen, author of Sotah, has a Web site with excerpts, interviews and previews. You can sign up to receive her free online articles on issues central to Jewish and Israeli life [http://www.naomiragen.com/].

What about the next generation of writers? The National Foundation for Jewish Culture presented its first award for emerging Jewish fiction writers to Nathan Englander for his book For the Relief of Unbearable Urges [http://www.jewishculture.org/jcaa/nlcfictionaward-2000.htm]. (Note: I was only able to view this page using Internet Explorer.) At the Random House site, you can find more about Englander and read the "Unbearable Urges" short story online [http://www.randomhouse.com/boldtype/0499/englander/].

Next week, more places where you can read Jewish fiction online.

Until then, if you're in Toronto, check out the Jewish Book Fair, now in its 25th year [http://feduja.org/images/book-fair-guide.pdf]. (To read their brochure, you'll need Adobe Acrobat Reader – it's free [http://www.adobe.com/products/acrobat/readstep2.html].)

Updated 'relaxed' lexicon

The New Joys of Yiddish by Leo Rosten, Random House of Canada, 2001.

A quarter of a century ago, the late Leo Rosten put together what he called "a relaxed lexicon of Yiddish, Hebrew and Yenglish words often encountered in English." He enriched his alphabetical word list with informative excursions into Judaism: holidays, ceremonies, folklore, etc. – all of it garnished with stories, anecdotes, talmudic quotations, folk-sayings and jokes.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Over the years, this has been one of my favourite books for gift-giving and browsing. It has now been completely updated by Lawrence Bush, with hundreds of new entries and a valuable English to Yiddish index.

Most of the entries are brief and the following, selected at random, are typical of the book's style and manner.

Bobe-Mayse. Old wives' tale; nonsense; something patently silly and untrue. "Did she try to sell me a bobe-mayse!" It is my duty to inform you that bobe-mayse may derive from a Yiddish adaptation of The Story of Buvo or Buovo, a romantic 15th-century tale that was, in turn, an Italian reincarnation of the Bevis of Hampton cycle of romances. The stories, originally written in English, were translated into Italian, and from Italian were turned into Yiddish. In this vernacular they became popular among Jewish women.

Machetunim. The members of one's wife's or husband's extended family. "His wife comes from a large family; she must have fifty machetunim."

The definitive explication of machetunim is to be found in this sardonic conundrum:

Q: Why did Adam and Eve live so long?

A: Because their lives were not shortened by machetunim.

Prost. No more cutting or scornful adjective existed, in my home, than prost. To call someone "proster Yid" or "a proster mentsh" was to dismiss him as hopelessly deserving of disrespect. Money, success, influence, had nothing to do with it: "Prost is prost!"

Yarmulke. No religious edict I can uncover directs Jews to cover their heads – though Exodus prescribes head covering for the Temple priests. During the early Middle Ages, the rabbis instructed Jewish men not to go about bareheaded. Why? Because man should cover his head as a sign of respect before God, whose glory and radiance are, as Maimonides said, "around and above [us]."

Metsieh. Pronounced meh-TSEE-eh, to rhyme with "Let's see a." Hebrew: "find."

1. A bargain, a lucky break. "Believe me, that's a metsieh."

2. No bargain (used bitterly), nothing to brag about. "He married some metsieh."

Mish-Mosh.

1. A mix-up, a mess, a hodgepodge, a fouled-up state of things.

2. Confusion galore. "What a mish-mosh."

No Jew pronounces this "mish-mash." In fact, when a congressman on one of Groucho Marx's You Bet Your Life television shows did say "mish-mash," Groucho gave him a startled stare and remarked: "You'll never get votes in the Bronx if you go on saying mish-mash instead of mish-mosh."

I consider mish-mosh a triumph of onomatopoeia – and a word unlike any I know to suggest flagrant disorder.

"One Look"
Primo Levi was a slave labourer during the Holocaust. One day, while excavating heavy stones near Auschwitz, Levi was ready to give up. Weakened by hunger and sickness, Levi decided he could not move even one more stone - until he looked up and saw his guard staring at him. Unbelievably, there was compassion in the guard's eyes. The man looked away immediately, but that one moment, that one sympathetic glance, gave Levi the courage to continue.

Catholic-Jewish conference stresses need for dialogue

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The most important component in Catholic-Jewish relations is momentum: Keeping the dialogue alive is the best way to ensure future successes, a colloquium on relations between the two faiths heard last week.

The gathering, held at the University of Toronto's St. Michael's College, brought together theologians, interfaith activists, academics and members of the clergy for a day of workshops and brainstorming sessions on how to keep the still-young dialogue moving forward.

Mainly, participants agreed that Jews and Catholics – with 2,000 years of suspicion, mistrust and contempt between them – have travelled a miraculous distance in less than a generation, but that there's also still much work to do.

The conference's keynote speaker was Edward Cardinal Cassidy, the former head of the Vatican's influential Commission on Religious Relations With the Jews, and under whose watch many of the recent advances in relations were made.

In his address, Cassidy acknowledged two millennia of "sad history" between the two religions, of "suffering, discrimination, isolation and teaching of contempt."

But the turning point came in 1965, when the Second Vatican Council acknowledged the Catholic Church's history of anti-Semitism, and finally absolved Jews from the charge they killed Jesus.

Pope John Paul II has taken relations even further, his commitment spurred by the destruction of the rich Jewish community in Poland in which he grew up, Cassidy said. The current pontiff has visited the synagogue in Rome, established the Vatican's diplomatic relations with Israel, decreed that anti-Semitism is a sin, expressed regret at the Church's "inaction" during the Holocaust and – the "singular moment" – visited Israel last year.

"Much has been accomplished, much has changed, but the work must go on," said Cassidy, who headed the commission on relations with Jews from 1989 to this past March. "We have made real progress past mistrust and suspicion toward reconciliation and goodwill."

He made a point of saying that the "reluctance" of some Jews to enter a dialogue with Catholics is "understandable."

Jews and Catholics worship the same God and the moral code of both faiths is based on the Ten Commandments and the Torah, Cassidy noted.

Ultimately, the goal of dialogue is not to agree on everything. These are "two distinct faiths, with common roots and differences which must be expected."

Jews and Catholics should view each other as "two equal partners seeking to build a better world."

Asked later whether the Church plans to recognize Jerusalem as the capital of Israel, Cassidy demurred, saying the city's status must be negotiated by the interested parties.

In a response to Cassidy, Prof. David Novak of the University of Toronto's Jewish studies department agreed that the Second Vatican Council "set the agenda" for dialogue between Jews and Catholics.

To date, said Novak, dialogue has taken place on three levels: the diplomatic, the intellectual and scholarly, and the popular. A problem, he pointed out, is that whereas the Catholic Church is highly centralized, there's no comparable structure to modern Judaism. "There's no Sanhedrin (the supreme Jewish council in Temple times). It's difficult to say who represents Jews."

On a popular level, "we are just at a point where Jews no longer have to regard Catholics as an enemy presence."

Novak is in a position to know. He was one of four North American Jewish thinkers to co-author last year's landmark document, Dabru Emet (Speak the Truth), signed by 170 Jewish leaders of every denomination. The document was hailed as the first major Jewish statement to acknowledge and welcome recent changes in how Christians view Jews.

Jews "are not the same people as a result of years of discussion with Catholics," Novak said.

A "bigger problem" looms ahead, he said: relations between Christians, Jews and Muslims, which will be difficult because Muslims look to an altogether different scripture for divine guidance. However, "that's not insurmountable."

What has been a major roadblock, said some conference participants, is the international commission of inquiry into the Vatican's Holocaust-era archives. The seven historians, including U of T's Prof. Michael Marrus, began their work in 1999. It reviewed 11 volumes before issuing a preliminary report.

But this past June, the Vatican abruptly halted the research, saying records beyond 1923 could not be made accessible "for technical reasons."

Marrus told the conference he feels the commission's work is now "unlikely" to go forward, at least not as originally mandated.

Other concerns and priorities expressed at the meeting included:

- Getting more Conservative and Orthodox Jews involved in dialogue with Catholics;
- Expunging the Catholic Good Friday liturgy of passages still problematic for Jews;
- Dealing with fallout from plans, now postponed, to beatify the war-time Pope, Pius XII, after charges he could have done far more to thwart the Nazi genocide; and with plans to proceed with the beatification of the 19th century pontiff, Pius IX, alleged to have been an unrepentant anti-Semite;
- Discussing theology without sacrificing commitment to it.
- Endeavoring to filter goodwill and rapprochement down to local levels by getting synagogues and churches to work together, and priests and rabbis to get to know one another.

As Cassidy stated, the goal of dialogue is "not to eliminate differences, but to deepen understanding."

Israeli feelings towards Americans called one-sided

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Israelis have always felt a strong identification with Americans, a feeling that increased tremendously after the terror attacks of Sept. 11, a leading Israeli journalist told a gathering recently at Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

But Judy Lash Balint lamented that Americans don't seem to identify or sympathize with Israel nearly as much, as the Jewish state endures the latest cycle of Palestinian violence.

"We thought and hoped that our level of identification would be reciprocal," she said.

"We thought North Americans would understand what we were going through, and that world opinion would shift and people would understand that terror is terror is terror.

"But sad to say, it seems that Arafat's terror against Jews is placed in an entirely different category by the world community."

To her astonishment, Lash Balint noted that the American and British media have been critical of Israel for targeting known terrorist leaders. "But isn't that exactly what Bush and Blair are trying to do?" she asked.

Israel, she said, is "the canary down the mineshaft" as far as Islamic fundamentalist terrorism is concerned, and she noted that few Western political analysts seemed to be paying attention to terror attacks against Israel or even U.S. targets in recent years. Few seemed to recognize the enormous threat posed by Islamic fundamentalism.

Israel and America have distinctly different ways of reacting to terror, she noted.

Whereas shopping malls and coffee shops were shuttered all over America after the Sept. 11 attacks, Israeli commercial establishments affected by violence usually reopen as soon as possible afterwards "so people don't feel they're being closed down by terrorism," she said.

Lash Balint, who was in the United States on Sept. 11, said she felt more secure after she returned to Israel, which has more experience in dealing with bioterror and other threats. Like many of her neighbours, she was recently required to stand in line at a shopping mall to renew her gas mask and medical kit.

"We have a very organized security system for dealing with these things, and it makes you feel better," she said.

Israelis cope with and are affected by terror-related stress in many ways, she said. Some stave off depression by avoiding television newscasts; others travel to relieve the pressure; still others develop eating and sleep disorders and other psychosomatic illnesses.

Increasing numbers are turning to religion and prayer – there has been a proliferation of religious classes – and some concentrate on doing chesed, acts of loving kindness, she said. "People are taking care of one another... trying to alter the balance with the good deeds and the bad deeds."

Lash Balint offered insight into the anti-Israel bias that seems to pervade the international press. Many foreign journalists stationed in the Middle East arrive with little previous knowledge of regional politics, and rely upon friendly young Palestinian "fixers" to help them get their stories and information, she said. The Palestinians have a cadre of about 400 fixers, she said, while the Israelis have none.

"People come to the Middle East with a certain set of assumptions, for example...that the Palestinians are in a struggle for their independence and the armed Israelis are standing in their way. Period. End of assumption." And many use the BBC or other biased sources to attain necessary background, she said.

Lash Balint urged her audience not to distance themselves from Israel, to visit often, to consider making aliyah, to remember the victims of terror, and to challenge political commentators who attempt to foist the "blame Israel syndrome."

She was in Toronto to promote her new book. Jerusalem Diaries: In Tense Times offers a series of brief, impressionistic essays that captures the pressures and emotions of daily life in Jerusalem from November 1998 to May 2001. Published by Gefen, it is available in select Jewish bookstores.

Film captures life of teen photographer

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Out of the Fire, a documentary that will air next week on Vision TV, tells the story of Faye Lazebnik Schulman, a 15-year-old photographer who witnessed both heinous crimes and courageous acts of bravery in Nazi-occupied Poland.

Review of Out of the Fire

please see page 46

Her skill with a camera, which she learned from her brother while working in her family's photography business, saved her from being executed by the Nazis, who used her to develop film. She later escaped from the final roundup for execution and joined the Molotova Brigade in the Russian resistance.

Schulman, who now lives in Toronto, developed film that included scenes from the ghetto of her hometown, where 1,850 Jews – her family among them – were marched to the trenches and killed. She lost her parents, two sisters, two brothers and their families. She hid a few copies of the pictures for herself.

For more than half a century, Schulman refused to return to Lenin, the Polish town where she was born and raised. Before World War II, it had been a peaceful town of 5,000 Jews and 5,000 White Russians, and in the film, Schulman recalls the pleasant relations between the people in the Pinsk area. But the atmosphere changed when the Russians took over Lenin in 1939. In 1941, the Nazis occupied the area.

After 55 years, Schulman returns to Lenin, in what is now Belarus, to recount the story of her teen years and present flashbacks about a once-vibrant Jewish community.

Schulman told The CJN that she agreed to participate in the filming to dispel the idea that all Jews went to their deaths without resisting.

"There were 20,000 Jews who joined the partisans, lived in the woods, slept on the ground despite the heat of the summers and freezing winters and fought the Germans," she said.

The partisans obtained food, medical supplies and ammunition by attacking the Nazis in their headquarters. They derailed rail trucks, blew up bridges and blew up ammunition trains heading to the front lines.

Schulman's powerful photos, which are sure to stay with viewers well after they finish watching the film, show houses being set on fire with families inside and children being buried alive while their parents, grandparents, aunts and uncles are shot at the side of trenches.

The powerful film has not gone unnoticed. Producer/director, Shelley Saywell of Bishari Film Productions recently won an award for best direction for a documentary at Canada's Golden Sheaf Awards 2001.

Schulman, who lectures extensively about her experiences during the war, is also well known for her story, which she recounted in a 1995 book entitled A Partisan's Memoir: Woman of the Holocaust. Her photographs are in Holocaust museums in Washington, D.C., Israel, Poland and Russia.

During filming in Minsk, Schulman met with the commander and other partisans from her Molotova Brigade.

She also visited Rosa, a Jewish partisan fighter who remained in Poland, and she met with a non-Jewish man, a retired school teacher who recently moved to Lenin and put up a memorial plaque to the Jews who were slaughtered in the trenches there.

Today, Lenin, whose Jewish community had been burned to the ground, has about four or five Jewish families who moved there after the war.

"They all greeted me with warmth and affection," Schulman said. "They presented me with all kinds of awards and documents. I never realized until I saw my pictures there how important they were."

She was surprised to find her pictures and a write-up about her bravery during the war in Polish museums.

In the film, Schulman also tells of her love affair with Morris Schulman, whom she met after she was liberated and had begun working for a Russian newspaper in Pinsk. They were married in December 1944. He died in 1992.

In 1948, the couple came to Canada. Faye says they wanted to go to Palestine, but at the time it was still controlled by the British and they were refused entry.

Out of the Fire depicts the joy Schulman derives from her family: her daughter, a physician, and her son, an orthopedic surgeon, and her six grandchildren. In one particularly moving moment, we watch Schulman participate in her grandson Nathan's bar mitzvah.

Out of the Fire airs Monday, Nov. 5 at 9 p.m. and 11 p.m. on Vision TV.

Holocaust survivor and partisan fighter Faye Schulman points to her picture taken 55 years ago when she was in the resistance in a scene from Out of the Fire, which recounts her experiences during the war years.

Weizmann Institute still a leader in research: Harari

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel generates more income from research than almost any other university in the world, says its outgoing president.

"We've emerged as one of the world's top five institutes in terms of royalties from our patents and intellectual property," Haim Harari declared in a recent interview.

"Relative to our size, we're number one," he added.

"We've always believed that if you do first-class basic research, the practical results will come automatically. And that is what has happened."

Total industrial sales of products developed and patented at the Weizmann Institute exceeded $2 billion (US) in Israel and abroad last year.

"With all the problems Israel is facing, we're an island of stability, prosperity and success," said Harari, who concludes his 13-year term of office on Dec. 1.

Among the products it has patented are drugs for treating multiple sclerosis – Copaxone and Beta-Interferone – and satellite TV encryption technology, used by Rupert Murdoch's News Corporation empire.

Located on a 300-acre landscaped campus in Rehovot, 22 kilometres south of Tel Aviv, the institute focuses on several areas of basic research: semiconductors and micro chips, brain and cancer research, nanochemistry and the interface between genetics and computer science.

Harari, a theoretical particle physicist, is a fifth-generation Israeli born in Jerusalem in 1940.

Haim Harari

A year after receiving a PhD from the Hebrew University, he joined the institute, becoming its youngest ever professor.

Founded in 1934 as the Daniel Sieff Research Institute, it was formally dedicated as the Weizmann Institute of Science in 1949.

It took its name from Chaim Weizmann, a chemist and Zionist movement dignitary who served as its first president.

Later, Weizmann became Israel's first president.

Harari, who holds the Annenberg Chair of High Energy Physics, headed the institute's science teaching department and was dean of its Feinberg Graduate School before his appointment as president.

After he steps down, he will be chair of the board of the new Davidson Institute of Science Education.

Its mandate is to raise the level of science education among pre-university students in Israel.

Compared to Europe, Israel is faring quite well. "But that's not sufficient," said Harari, a member of the Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities.

"Our physical existence depends on our scientific capabilities. It's absolutely crucial that we get to the top in this field."

Harari, who was instrumental is creating the Perach tutoring program for underprivileged children, observed that Israel is years ahead of the Arabs in real science.

"We produce more science than one billion Muslims, which is unfortunate. If the Arab world was more scientifically oriented, it might be more peace-oriented."

In his view, there is no chance that Arab scientists will catch up any time soon.

"Scientific advancement is related to the openness of a society," he said, implying that Arab societies are held back by autocratic regimes.

Harari disclosed that The Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science has embarked on a $10 million fund-raising campaign for laser research.

"We're about one-third of the way there."

Over the years, Canadians have sponsored major projects, from the Koffler Accelerator of the Canada Centre of Nuclear Physics to the Solar Energy Research Centre.

Forty percent of the institute's $200 million (US) budget is provided by the Israeli government.

The rest is generated by royalties, philanthropy and external research grants.

It employs a staff of 200 tenured professors, 400 PhDs and 600 technicians, engineers and laboratory personnel.

On campus are 700 post-graduate students, 150 of whom are foreigners.

"We've had Egyptian and Jordanian students, too," he noted.

Alex Grossman to be honoured at Negev Dinner

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Alex Grossman, the honoree at this year's Jewish National Fund's Negev Dinner, survived the Holocaust, built a giant land development corporation here and rose to be one of the leading Jewish communal figures in the world.

The proceeds from the 53rd annual Negev Dinner, which will take place Nov. 18 at the Sheraton Centre Hotel, will go to the development of a major reservoir in the southeastern Negev at Ne'ot Temarim, and to Massuah (The Beacon). Massuah is an institution half an hour north of Tel Aviv that teaches students and teachers of all religions from around the world what the Holocaust meant and the impact it has had, and attempts to promote understanding of those terrible events.

"One of the reasons I agreed to [be the honoree at the Negev Dinner] is because JNF is the only organization that is completely apolitical," Grossman says.

"By its very nature, it has nothing to do with any political party, only to improve the land, the roads and the water system. I feel that Israel can grow when the land is served without any political influence."

He also speaks of his commitment to Massuah, which he created with the late Gideon Hausner, former chief prosecutor at the Eichmann trial, and the late Moshe Kol, a prominent cabinet minister in several Israeli governments.

Born in 1919 in Krakow, Poland, Grossman recalls that in the mid 1930s, a Jewish professor at the University of Dresden in Germany "landed in our house when he, along with thousands of other Jews, was shipped to the Polish border."

The professor told the 17-year-old Grossman and his family what was happening in Germany and that this would also happen to the Jews in Poland. The man, who Grossman says had never seen a seder or lived a Jewish lifestyle told them, "Throw away what you can't take and run."

It was not until the war broke out that Grossman and others began to realize that the professor was right.

"I realized that I had nothing to lose, so I tried everything – 10 sets of false papers, impersonating a German, moving from place to place and working to bring out Jews."

His actions during the war set the tone for Grossman's life. His daring enabled him to save himself, his wife and many others. His wartime story has been documented by Yale University, Steven Spielberg and others.

He fled to Vienna and then to Budapest, Hungary. But his parents and two sisters were taken to Belzec Concentration camp and perished.

Liberated in 1945 by the Russians, Grossman, his wife Genia, whom he had met in 1941 in Poland and married in Budapest, and their young daughter Lily left for Toronto in 1950. Their son George was born there soon after.

Alex Grossman, Negev Dinner honoree.

Grossman entered the real estate business and created Belmont Construction with partners Abe Bleeman and the late Joe Silver. They became some of Toronto's most successful land developers. Grossman is president of Belmont Properties Inc., president of Grossman Holdings, chair of Pinedale Properties Ltd. and director of Egis Holdings and Primegg companies.

In 1955, the late J. Irving Oelbaum, a community leader and philanthropist, singled Grossman out and invited him to spend a week with him as he carried out his community activities.

"I was hooked," says Grossman. "From then on, I have participated in numerous communal efforts."

He served as national chair of State of Israel Bonds, chair of Canadian Friends of Massuah, chair of the board of Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation and has been active in other local and Israeli organizations.

Grossman is the 11th recipient ever – the third Canadian – of the Golda Meir Leadership Award presented annually by International State of Israel Bonds on behalf of the Israeli Ministry of Finance, in recognition of his years promoting Israel's economic and social progress.

Among those paying tribute to Grossman are honorary dinner patron, Ontario Lieutenant-Governor Hilary Weston; honorary dinner chairs, Judy Feld Carr, Senator Jerry Grafstein, Dr. Tirone David, Sedric Richie and Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman; master of ceremonies, former Ontario premier, William Davis; dinner chair Brent Belzberg; campaign co-chairs Bert Raphael and Ron Appleby; and JNF Toronto president Frank Wilson.

Facelift, renovation planned for Bloor JCC

Sarner said the assistance of UJA Federation was crucial to making that dream come true. With its partnership, the downtown members were able to keep the centre operating and eventually raise the funds to refurbish it.

"We have overcome the doubts, negativity and concern, and today we're assuming a completely unprecedented level of commitment from the Jewish community," Sarner said. "This is a testament to the idea that Jewish [dreams] can come true."

Nadal, president and CEO of MDC Corporation, recalled how he grew up at the "South Y," playing basketball in the gym and attending its summer camp.

"I grew up here dreaming about my future. It, perhaps more than any other facility in the city, represents for me the continuum that is Jewish Toronto."

City councillor Olivia Chow, representing the City of Toronto, predicted the renovated centre would revitalize the downtown neighborhood. "but more important, it will build a strong community.

"I really welcome the Jewish community coming back downtown," she said.

At the heart of the first phase of the building project will be the construction of four new stores, anchored by a Second Cup coffee shop at the building's northeast corner. Rents from the new tenants should bring the centre $180,000 to $190,000 a year.

The renovation will proceed into what is today the auditorium, chapel and kitchen. Offices will be constructed above the new shops, while to the south, a 300-seat theatre and two aerobics studios are planned.

The chapel will be relocated to the third floor, along with program rooms, a teen computer room and a conference room. The facility will not close during the renovations.

To date, $8 million to $9 million has been pledged towards the project. The Nadal Centre will be built as part of the JTT initiative in which the Federation matches philanthropists who have specific interests to appropriate non-profit organizations. JTT is expected to account for $1.1 billion in new Jewish community infrastructure projects over the next 10 years.

Boys Town Jerusalem's dean visits Toronto

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The times have changed and the world has changed, said Rabbi Moshe Linchner during a recent trip to Toronto. "Perhaps now [after Sept. 11] people will realize that there is a power above that has the final say."

Rabbi Linchner was speaking at Shaarei Shomayim synagogue after a dinner for Canadian Friends of Boys Town Jerusalem. He is dean of the school.

People have become complacent about business, about the world economy, about how the world works, he said. "They thought that they had control over what goes on."

Americans and Canadians are not used to living in fear, he said. In Israel, "every morning I turn on the radio, scared to hear what is on it. You don't know from minute to minute what will happen."

Israel, he said, is, not surprisingly, obsessed with security. However, Israelis have come to realize that "you can't build a country on tanks and an army."

What Israel needs, Rabbi Linchner said, is youth who are educated, who have a sense of purpose in their lives. "They have to know what they are fighting for, and be proud of it."

Youngsters who have been educated in those values, the rabbi said, are not the ones who are leaving Israel. "They understand what Israel is, why they have a right to the land, and why it is important to preserve that land."

Israeli schools have many of the same problems as American ones do, he said. Fifty percent carry weapons to school, not to use against Arabs, but against their schoolmates. Forty percent have experience with drugs.

When the Israeli ministry of education proposed extending the school year into the summer months, there was an outcry, the rabbi said. "One parent wrote a letter to a newspaper pleading against the proposal – he would rather have his child at home where he would be safe, instead of going to school, where when he comes home, you never know what shape he will in – what bruises he will have."

When his late father, Rabbi Alexander Linchner, founded Boys Town in 1948, his son said, its philosophy was to "teach the boys values, not just math and science."

Each boy must volunteer to help others, in such ways as helping children with their homework or visiting hospitals. They may also choose to become counsellors at Zichron Menachem, – a summer camp for kids with cancer – or at camps in Odessa and Minsk. They may also become counsellors at Camp Shalom, a camp for children from Gush Katif, a town in southern Gaza that is under constant bombardment, where children are sometimes forced to live for months in shelters.

Many of the students at Boys Town come from poor, underprivileged, dysfunctional or immigrant families. Without the tuition assistance that the school provides, "they wouldn't have the skills to make a life for themselves, or to contribute to the state," Rabbi Moshe Linchner said.

The intifadah has affected the school, as it has the whole country. "It is not just Gilo," Rabbi Linchner said, referring to the suburb on the southern edge of Jerusalem near Boys Town, which has faced intermittent attacks from Palestinians in nearby Beit Jala. "All Israel is on the front line."

Every boy has a cell phone and is in frequent contact with his parents, who call all the time. "We can hear the shooting and see the helicopters. The earth shakes."

Rabbi Linchner lamented the difference in his travel experience this time. Ben-Gurion airport, usually full of hustle and bustle, is now quiet and empty. There were no line-ups at passport control. "It's scary – like when the Yom Kippur War was going on."

מלחמה באפגאניסטאן - יאיר שילוף

In May 2001, he led a group of journalism students to Poland (The March of Remembrance & Hope) to help them find ways to write about the Holocaust. In the process, he discovered a great deal about himself.

In addition, a number of Canadian Rwandan students who also took part in the trip will discuss how their encounter with the Holocaust in Poland helped them cope with their own losses suffered during the 1994 Rwandan genocide.

Gap between Orthodoxy, feminism said still great

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israeli women attempting to bridge the gap between Orthodoxy and feminism are still in the minority, but the numbers are growing quickly, says a writer and lecturer on feminism and Judaism.

"We are a minority, but we have some great women and we are growing rapidly," said Rivkah Lubitch, a rabbinical advocate at Yad La'isha, an organization offering legal aid to women abandoned by their husbands or whose husbands refuse to grant them a divorce.

Lubitch, who teaches at a beit midrash for women, spoke recently at Women's Voices, a program sponsored by The New Israel Fund (NIF).

NIF, founded in 1979, works to improve the lives of Israeli women by providing resources to reduce gender-based discrimination; achieve greater representation of women in key leadership positions such as the Israeli parliament; expand anti-violence programs; defend the rights of women unable to obtain a get; and advance the status and develop leadership among Arab women in Israel.

Also speaking at the program was Lesley Sachs, associate director of the Israel Religious Action Centre, the public and legal advocacy arm of the Israeli Movement for Progressive Judaism.

Lubitch said that a turning point in her views on modern Orthodoxy and feminism came when her then six-year-old daughter asked her why God hated girls. "When I asked her why, she said that a boy thanks God every day for not making him a girl. I realized then that [despite] being outspoken about women's issues, I had done nothing; nothing had changed in my religion."

There have now been some changes, however, she said. "We call it the quiet revolution. There are more than 16 schools where girls are able to study Talmud, and although the schools do not [necessarily] have a feminist awareness, they do take in the girls who want to study Judaism just for the sake of studying."

Women can also study to become rabbinical advocates who can argue cases in religious court, and halachic advisers, she said.

Generally, however, there is still a lot of fear of women taking part in religious rituals, she said. "This is frightening to both men and women. Women putting on tallit [are seen as] more threatening than women studying Talmud. It is seen as something from outside, from America. People see it as a rebellion."

Even among those women performing rituals, there is some tension between those who want them performed the way men perform them, and those who want them performed differently, said Lubitch.

The problem of Israeli women obtaining gets is growing, she said, because there are more divorces. "The more divorces, the more men who will not give a get."

A possible solution would be for people to get married civilly, but that only solves the problem for non-religious women, she said.

Her organization tries to press rabbis to provide solutions within Halachah, she says.

Sachs said that through a forum for the freedom of marriage, funded by NIF, they are trying to give public attention to the issue of people getting married any way they want. "In a survey we put out, 65 percent of the people said they believe in freedom of choice in marriage."

The Knesset, Sachs said, is a place where women can be heard, "but not enough. There are only 15 women in the Knesset, and there will never be sufficient representation because religious parties have no women representing them."

On a bright note, she said, jobs are opening up for women in the army. "When I was in the army, women only did support work such as typing and answering the switchboard.

"Women now feel they are doing something meaningful, and I think that when they feel that way, they will view life differently."

The backlash to women serving alongside men, however, is that leaders of the religious Zionist party find it inappropriate. "The chief of staff has said, however, that he will not give up the women. Hopefully this backlash will pass."

Outreach is an important part of both their work, they said. "There are a lot of women who do not know about us, but the feminist scene is changing. There are many women who call themselves feminists, but there are still a lot of hurdles," said Sachs.

1,200 tulip bulbs to be planted Nov. 5

TORONTO — In memory of the one and a half million children who were victims of the Holocaust, students from the Brown and Deer Park schools are planting a bed of 1,200 Anne Frank tulip bulbs on Nov. 5.

This is the 13th year that special Anne Frank bulbs will be planted in Amsterdam Park at Avenue Road and St. Clair Avenue, since then-mayor Art Eggleton proclaimed Anne Frank Day on Nov. 2, 1989.

Assisting the children will be a member of the consular corps of the Netherlands, members of the Jewish and Dutch-Canadian communities of Toronto and members of the Royal Canadian Legion.

In preparing the students, teachers have focused on the efforts of the Allied armies in the liberation of Europe, and in particular, on the role of the Canadian Armed Forces who liberated The Netherlands. Although they were a month too late for Anne Frank, who died in Bergen-Belsen, a few attending the planting will remember those soldiers and their sacrifice.

The event is co-sponsored by the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Dutch-Canadian Association of Greater Toronto.

Third annual reading of the names at U of T

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A group of Jewish students is seeking the names of Holocaust victims with a Toronto connection for its third annual Reading of the Names.

The 24-hour event – a joint effort of the Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPi) and the University of Toronto's Jewish Student Union – will take place Nov. 8-9, from noon until noon, outside the University College Union, 79 St. George St.

Robert Birgenau, the president of U of T, will kick off the readings, and local Holocaust survivor Alex Levin will also speak.

"We want to make [the event] relevant to the Toronto community and the university community," said Nathaniel Lipkus, event co-ordinator and immediate past president of the 55-member AEPi chapter at U of T.

Other university student organizations representing groups such as Armenians and lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender students have also been invited to attend and to provide and read names of Holocaust victims. "There won't just be Jewish names," Lipkus said.

As of last week, only the Campus Chaplains Association and LGBTOut (Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender students of U of T) were confirmed.

Lipkus said organizers try to ensure that as many people as possible take part in the reading. He said that, as in past years, Jewish professors were also being invited to read.

Last year Lipkus' chapter won AEPi's North American Chapter of the Year award and split the organization's Philip H. & Susan Cohen Award for Jewish Communal Service, worth $750, with the JSU. The latter is AEPi's highest award for community service, of the 29 it offers.

While AEPi runs a clothing drive to benefit homeless people (the fourth annual one begins this month) and takes part in packing and delivering Passover baskets, the Reading of the Names was probably the main reason for the award, said Lipkus, who is in his fourth year studying finance and biochemistry. "It was our most high-profile event."

He estimates that 20,000 names were read last year. Most of the names originated from a Yad Vashem CD-ROM. A nominal amount of information, where available, was included in the readings.

For Lipkus, the names alone were significant. "I found names that were similar to friends of mine." The whole exercise was like a Kaddish, he said, adding that the memorial prayer was said at the end of the event.

This year in conjunction with the event, which is part of Holocaust Education Week, AEPi is raising money for the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation.

Anyone who would like to submit a name can e-mail Lipkus at n.lipkus@utoronto.ca or contact the JSU at jsuuoft@hotmail.com or, by phone, 416-978-0421. Names can also be submitted or potential readers can volunteer by going to the Web site, http://jsu.sa.utoronto.ca.

Concerns of leadership hopefuls

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

As callous as it may sound, a leadership aspirant never does anything without calculating how it could potentially affect his or her prospects in a future leadership race.

So it is not beyond reason to imagine that Health Minister Alan Rock was concerned with the portrayal of his handling of the Cipro, anti-anthrax antidote fiasco last week.

On the one hand, he is no different than several other contenders who undoubtedly have been watching anxiously as Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley has steadily gained more and more stature, if not influence – both in Canada and abroad.

As word spread on the Hill that Manley was planning a trip to the Middle East, leadership contenders like Rock must also have felt some pressure to do something in the context of the war on terrorism. The dramatic sidebar story of the anthrax scare must have seemed to Rock like a perfect launching pad to assert his leadership, especially given the departure of his most important political foil, Ontario Premier Mike Harris.

Add in a little incompetence within his department and one had all the necessary ingredients for the imbroglio that unfolded.

Opposition members attacked Rock for his alleged preferential treatment in directing the generic Cipro contract to Apotex, citing a relationship he had with the firm 20 years ago. Although it seems clear to us that there was never any attempt on Rock's part to purposely direct business to Apotex, the opposition tried to create the perception that the resulting contract was akin to "insider trading."

In an unusual step, Rock presented two affidavits by unidentified officials within his department who swore that Bayer, the patent holders for Cipro, was unable to supply the amount of the medicine Rock wanted to buy for Canadians. Bayer backed off and the minister appeared to have won the publicity battle with the drug giant. Of course, it did not hurt his case when the Americans demanded and received price relief for the anti-anthrax pills they were ordering from Bayer.

Now it appears that Rock has his eyes set on securing a supply of anti-smallpox vaccine for Canadians. One assumes his department will know how and where to get it.

Looking through the leadership prism, it is hard to predict how the events of last week will play out for the embattled health minister.

There is now also an additional complicating factor for Rock, namely, the limelight that another presumed contender, Finance Minister Paul Martin, will be occupying in December when he delivers a budget far in advance of the date he had hoped to do so. Political and military events are unfolding all around us in ways that are profoundly affecting the Canadian economy and, indeed, economies around the world. Will Martin emerge as a steady steward or as a desperate decision-maker? Time will tell.

Arab-Canadian art exhibit runs despite controversy

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – An exhibit of Arab-Canadian art has once again stirred controversy, this time within the Jewish community.

The Lands Within Me: Expressions by Canadian Artists of Arab Origin, which was scheduled to open at the Canadian Museum of Civilization on Oct. 19, was initially postponed indefinitely by the museum in light of the events of Sept. 11.

Yet after an outpouring of criticism, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien intervened and the museum relented, opening the exhibit on schedule.

One segment of the exhibit in particular, a video in three parts, has raised concerns. According to Rubin Friedman, national communications director of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), one part is irrelevant to the exhibit's theme as it deals with the conflict in Yugoslavia.

A second part of the video contains statements against Israel, and the third is an interview with a couple in a refugee camp in South Lebanon who fled the Arab-Israeli war in 1948, and who report second-hand rumours of Israeli atrocities. The video urges the Arab world to unite in the Palestinian uprising.

"Because of the eagerness of the prime minister, because of his desire not to discriminate against others, he has inadvertently let in a piece which discriminates against Israel," Friedman said.

"We believe our prime minister's good-heartedness has been taken advantage of. [He] was right to be concerned about the postponement of the exhibition, but now that we have seen the video, it is clear that the bureaucrats were also right to consider doing so."

A spokesperson for the museum said that no changes would be made to the exhibition.

"We realize that some of the elements of the exhibition generate discussion among Canadians," the spokesperson said. "The museum is attentive to this discussion and we welcome feedback... however, all the art in the exhibition will remain."

In a strongly worded letter to John English, chair of the board of trustees of the Canadian Museum of Civilization, CJC President Keith Landy, noted that "our own Jewish community in Canada has, at least since the outbreak of the latest round of Palestinian violence more than a year ago, been on the receiving end of numerous acts of violence, vandalism, harassment, threats and hatred."

While supporting the government's condemnation of anti-Arab attacks, Landy added, "At a time when we are trying to build solidarity among all Canadians and when we are part of an international coalition that is set to combat terrorism, it would be seriously damaging to our efforts to allow one of our national institutions to be used as a vehicle to promote the kind of hatred which is at the root of the attack against the United States in the first place, as well as the ugly situation in our own country."

Copies of Landy's letter were also sent to Sheila Copps, minister of Canadian Heritage, and to Chrétien.

The exhibit is scheduled to run until March 9, 2003.

Jewish Federation of Winnipeg reviving young adults division

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — When community worker Judi Price-Rosen moved to Winnipeg from Toronto last fall, she was surprised to discover that there weren't many programs for young Jewish adults.

Price-Rosen, who moved last September with her husband, Kevin (originally from Winnipeg), is now one of the co-chairs of the programming committee for the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal's newly revived Young Adult Division (YAD).

"The structure for YAD was there," the Suzuki teacher says. "It just needed a few people to become involved and create some programming."

Laura Jaeger Pollock, who was requested last year by Federation/CJA to rejuvenate YAD, says, "The federation is making a real commitment to make YAD a long-term success."

The first YAD program this year, a social evening at a downtown art gallery, was attended by about 150 people, Jaeger Pollock reports.

"We had wonderful feedback," she says.

Upcoming YAD programs include volunteering at a soup kitchen, sushi-making, a hamentashen bake-off and a speakers series featuring local philanthropists and businesspeople, to be held in private homes.

"It's a difficult age group [25 to 40] to program for," Jaeger Pollock notes. "Our goal is to connect people to the community, in some cases people who don't have a connection with the community. We want to make them feel welcome. In this age group, though, you have couples with young children and people concentrating on starting careers. It is a real challenge to get them out. We have to have creative and varied programs. What appeals to some won't appeal to others."

Another difficulty YAD organizers face is the reluctance of many young Jews to participate in activities that are "too Jewish."

"We want to take away the stigma from Jewish events and make ourselves user-friendly," Jaeger Pollock says. "That is why we are looking at having some of our activities in the kinds of venues that younger Jewish adults and other younger adults frequent."

YAD organizers are also planning to involve more individuals through a mentoring program.

"We hope some networking will take place that will perhaps get younger people more involved in the community or maybe help them in their careers," Jaeger Pollock says.

Winnipeg congregation dedicates new cemetery

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Members of the city's only Reform congregation recently dedicated their new cemetery.

About 40 members of Temple Shalom gathered at the Chapel Lawn Cemetery and Memorial Gardens for a short dedication service of the Beth Chaim cemetery on Oct. 21.

"The staff at [the non-Jewish] Chapel Lawn gave us a tour of their facility and explained to us what they are able to do for us in terms of Jewish practices," says Judy Huebner, Temple Shalom's current president and a humanities professor at the University of Winnipeg.

There are four Jewish cemeteries in the Winnipeg area. Huebner, serving her second term as president, says that Temple Shalom has been trying to open its own cemetery for the past 15 years. Many of the congregation's couples are of mixed faith.

"We have talked to other synagogues about using parts of their cemeteries," she says, "but we haven't been able to work anything out."

Temple Shalom has been in negotations with Chapel Lawn since the spring, Huebner says.

"Our rabbi [Michael Levenson] has conducted a couple of funerals and memorial services at Chapel Hill," Huebner says. "The Chapel Hill staff have been wonderful to work with."

The congregation is still negotiating the cost of the plots, which will be purchased on an as-needed basis. While non-Temple members can buy plots at Beth Chaim, they will have to buy them through the Temple.

Huebner is unsure yet what role, if any, the Chesed Shel Emes will play in preparing bodies for Beth Chaim. For more than 70 years, the Chesed Shel Emes has been the funeral home for Winnipeg's Jewish community. Its board is composed of representatives from all of Winnipeg's synagogues including Temple Shalom.

Hillel Kravetsky, Chesed Shel Emes' president, says, "It is outside our parameters to prepare bodies for burial in non-Jewish cemeteries. Just because a cemetery claims to be Jewish doesn't mean it is."

Ottawa's Lending Hand Award goes to fire fighters

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The first presentation of Ottawa's Lending Hand Award was made recently not to an individual, but to the Ottawa Professional Fire Fighters Association.

The award, established in January, 2001 "to recognize the selfless actions of Ottawa volunteers who help those in need," was inspired by the heroism of the late Raoul Wallenberg.

Although the group's charitable donations and benevolent efforts were considered by the award's selection committee, the main consideration was what the firefighters "do on a day-to-day basis," the association's president said in a statement to members.

MP Irwin Cotler, keynote speaker at the recent award ceremony, praised the efforts of the firefighters.

"The firefighters are in the business of saving lives," he said. "It is the firefighters who give the best expression to the saying, 'He who saves one life, it is as if he has saved the whole world'. Every day of their lives they are saving entire universes...so I am delighted to be able to participate in the common cause that brings us here this evening."

Raoul Wallenberg was a Swedish diplomat who was sent to Budapest during World War II and managed to save the lives of approximately 100,000 people while risking his own. When Soviet troops occupied Hungary in 1945, Wallenberg was taken away and never seen again. According to the Soviet authorities, he died in prison from a heart attack.

Wallenberg was made an honorary citizen of Canada in 1985. On January 17, 2002, the anniversary of his disappearance, Canada will mark the first annual Raoul Wallenberg Day.

Attending the award dinner were Leslie Sela and Emmi Gitzi, a brother and sister who are two of four Ottawa residents saved by Raoul Wallenberg (along with 500 other children as they stood before a firing squad).

Former deputy mayor of Ottawa, Jamie Fisher, said the idea for the Lending Hand Award has been germinating for 16 years, after he worked with volunteer Vera Gara to establish a park named after Wallenberg in what was the city of Nepean (now part of the amalgamated city of Ottawa).

The firefighters are donating the $1,000-award to the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario.

The dinner, held at Agudath Israel Congregation, was attended by over 250 people, including the ambassadors of Sweden, Hungary and Israel. The presentation was made by well-known Ottawa restaurateur David Smith.

Hamilton Bonds to honour 5 women

By JULIA KOLLEK
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Five young leaders will be honoured at this year's State of Israel Bonds Women's Division lunch for their support of Israel and work in the community.

Danna Brown, Rina Goldberg, Deanna Levy, Rachel Loewith and Alana Vertlieb were chosen as honorees for the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel Bonds, which was established in the 1950s by Israeli leaders, including David Ben-Gurion and Golda Meir.

The Nov. 4 event will also feature a showing of Israeli fashion in memory of local community leader Goldie Lax. The collection, featuring such companies as Hagara and Gottex, has been in New York and moves on to Montreal, but as it will not be seen in Toronto, arrangements have been made for those travelling in.

By honouring young women of achievement in the community, event organizers hope the lunch will draw attention to the next generation of women leaders.

"Part of what we wanted to do was raise public awareness about the remarkable work of our young people," said Lila Strub, event chair.

The initial plan was to honour just three women, but the organizers found they had a long list of potential names.

"It was a hard choice," Strub said. "In the end, we chose a blend of achievements and backgrounds."

The women short-listed have been involved in a wide variety of activites, including volunteering for Out of the Cold, a program that feeds the homeless; coordinating JCC community programs; supervising arts programs; leading Jewish youth organizations; co-ordinating food bank projects; fund-raising for charities; helping refugee families; and participating in missions such as the March of the Living. All five honorees are past winners of the Max Rotman Humanitarian Youth Award, a local presentation made every year to outstanding young leaders in the community.

Tickets for the lunch are $25. Optional Bond investments begin at $136. For more information, call 905-528-8639.

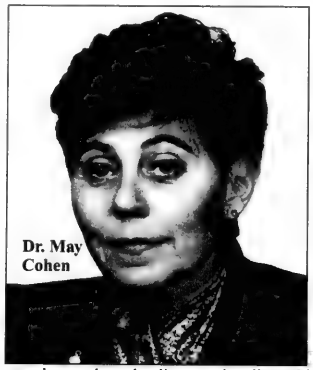
Two Hamiltonians named to Gallery of Distinction

By JULIA KOLLEK
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — The City of Hamilton has chosen Dr. May Cohen and broadcaster Paul Hanover to join the Hamilton Gallery of Distinction.

Their biographies and portraits will be added to a wall of honour, established in 1984 as part of the Hamilton Homecoming Bicentennial, on the third-floor of the city's convention centre.

Each year citizens are invited to nominate members of the community – from the past 200 years – who have made a significant contribution to the betterment of Hamilton or have distinguished themselves and brought pride to the city. Six finalists are selected.



Dr. May Cohen

Cohen has been a passionate advocate for women's health in Canada and around the world.

She was born in Montreal in 1931 and grew up in Toronto, where she graduated from high school as the top student in Ontario.

At a time when only 10 per cent of medical students were female, Cohen later graduated from the University of Toronto's medical school in 1955, leading her class with a gold medal for academic excellence.

In her 46-year career as a physician, teacher and academic, she has supported causes such as gender equality within the medical profession, the acceptance of women's particular health needs and a woman's right to make decisions about her health.

Cohen started out practising in Toronto and then joined McMaster University's Faculty of Health Sciences to teach and practise family medicine. She co-founded the Women's Health Office at McMaster – the first of its kind in Canada – and helped establish a curriculum committee on women's health for Ontario's five medical schools. From 1991 to 1996, she served as associate dean of health services for the Faculty of Health Sciences, which has named a research chair after her.

Cohen is married to Dr. Gerry Cohen, a semi-retired family practitioner in Hamilton, and is the mother of Eric, Russell, and the late Stuart. She has five grandchildren.

For his service to the community, Paul Hanover was dubbed "Mayor of the Morning" in 1956 by Hamilton's real mayor at the time, Lloyd Jackson.

Hanover was born in Hamilton in 1926, the youngest of six.

His radio career began in Sault Ste. Marie at the age of 17. Too young to be drafted to fight in World War II and with manpower diverted to the war effort, he found himself put in front of a microphone.

He later returned to Hamilton to join CHML, landing a job on the morning shift.

Generations of Hamiltonians woke up to Hanover's voice on CHML's morning show, which he hosted from 1945 to 1982.

He was also involved with the Harry Harris Jewish Hour that broadcast from 10 to 11 a.m. every Sunday morning. With its mix of cantorial music and social news, the show attracted dedicated listeners locally and in Toronto.

With the launch of CTV in 1961, Hanover successfully auditioned to host the network's first game show, Showdown – brought to Canada by Dan Enright, the disgraced producer of the rigged U.S. game show immortalized in the movie Quiz Show.

Paul Hanover

In 1986, when CKOC's new FM station, now known as K-Lite FM, was launched, Hanover was chosen as the first voice to go out on air.

Hanover's list of community participation includes 40 years as emcee for Hamilton's B'nai Brith Sports Night and service on boards ranging from Dundas Public Library and the Beverly Golf and Country Club to the Lupus Foundation of Ontario and the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario. He has also chaired the Jewish National Fund (JNF) and was citizen of the year for its Negev Dinner.

Officially retired in 1991, he volunteers at Shalom Village senior's residence, the Canadian Cancer Society, the downtown Out of the Cold program and the JNF.

Hanover has been married for 53 years. He and his wife, Helen, have two sons, Ian and Lawrence, and three grandchildren.

Cohen and Hanover will be feted at a dinner Nov. 14, together with this year's four other honorees.

Bring justice to bin Laden, not vice versa: Krauthammer the situation in Washington, D.C., and the American response to the situation in Israel.

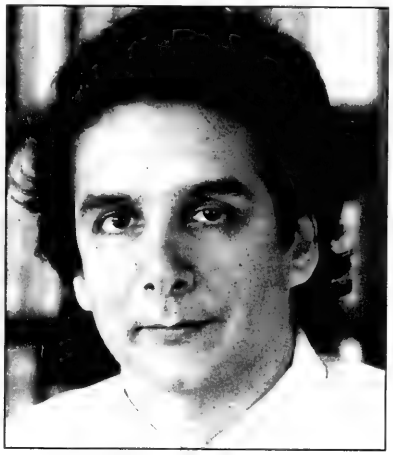
A weekly columnist for the Washington Post and monthly essayist for Time magazine, Krauthammer studied political science and economics at McGill University. American-born but raised in Montreal, he continued his studies at Oxford University and Harvard Medical School. Before entering the political sphere – he served at one point as a speech writer for former U.S. vice-president Walter Mondale – Krauthammer spent time in the field of psychiatry.

Despite his expertise, he was surprised that the terrorists who attacked the United States "could pull off something this complicated. I've never doubted their intent was serious. What surprised me was how serious they are in their execution."

With the collapse of the World Trade Center buildings, "we entered a new era," said Krauthammer. "That was a symbolic, psychological – and in a way geological – change. It changed the landscape forever."

His office, located six blocks from the White House, looks out on the air space above Reagan National Airport, which was temporarily closed due to security concerns. "On a normal day I [could] always see planes coming and going. What was eerie was that there was nothing. All you could see were the jet fighters. You never expect to live in a city where you live under jet fighter coverage."



Charles Krauthammer

It's hard to know what history will judge to be the most significant effect of the Sept. 11 attacks on the situation in Israel, Krauthammer said, but those events have "reinforced the American people's strong support for Israel and sense of Israel as a kindred democracy with similar problems."

On the other hand, he noted, there's a lot of pressure among the "elite" to put pressure on Israel to "placate" the coalition.

But there is no diplomatic solution, he maintains. "We know that, because Israel went to Camp David and offered practically everything. The best you can hope from diplomacy is a series of ceasefires, which won't hold and which will cost a lot of lives. The only possible solution is a military one." The United States also understands that now, he said.

Krauthammer made it clear both in the interview and in a recent column that the outcome would not be good if Osama bin Laden were turned over to the United States and brought to trial. "You make sure you don't capture him. We want to bring justice to him. This is wartime. We can dispense with the judicial niceties.

"If we bring him to justice, it will cause tens of thousands more lives to be lost. I'm confident the administration is well aware of that."

Anthrax also presents a "scary scenario, [but] I think it has to be put in perspective," he said. At the time Krauthammer was interviewed there had been only one death from anthrax (there has since been two more) among an American population of 280 million, he pointed out.

How should the average person be coping? "Bravely. Like the British in the Blitz…You carry on."

Carr has personally rescued to 3,237.

Most of those live in Brooklyn's large Syrian-Jewish émigré community, with others in Israel and Latin America.

Faraj Helwani was a poor vendor in the Damascus shouk. He was hit by a car about a year ago, leaving him partially disabled, Carr said.

Today, the family is being supported by the New York expatriate community.

Despite widespread knowledge of Carr's clandestine activities over 20 years, including Harold Troper's 1999 book The Ransomed of God, she isn't disclosing the particulars of this latest case.

Her work began in the mid-1970s. Two decades of highly secret schemes involving smuggling, coded messages back and forth, and the raising of money for baksheesh – bribes to Syrian officials – resulted in the rescue of the most oppressed Jewish community on earth. The operation was declared more or less complete around 1994, following the departure of the community's rabbi.

Following World War II, Syria had a vibrant Jewish community of over 40,000. That number was down to about 4,500 by the 1980s. Today, there are no Jews left anywhere but in the capital.

The last time the Feld fund had to be accessed was two years ago, to bring out an older man, his wife, their daughter and four grandchildren.

Now, Carr worries about the fate of the Syrian Jewish community's holy objects. Scores of Torah scrolls, books, historic codices and ceremonial artifacts have been left behind, not to mention Jewish private properties, businesses, synagogues and communally owned buildings.

The buildings, even private homes, have been "taken over," Carr says, with no compensation paid to their former owners.

Many books and Torahs have been smuggled out, but as for the remaining religious objects, "I have a strong suspicion that like the Nazis, the Syrians want to build a museum to a lost civilization," Carr said.

Carr doesn't know the fate of the remaining 38 Jews. The community's butcher has left, meaning they must depend on kosher meat shipped by a rabbi in Istanbul, but only on holidays. The rest of the year, they eat dairy.

Asked whether the Jews are in danger in light of current hostilities against Afghanistan, Carr said, "You don't know what will happen tomorrow. There's always a danger."

She said she can appreciate why the older people haven't expressed the desire to leave, "but I don't understand why the family stays."

Sharon plans to offer Arafat a state; violence must stop

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is working on a plan to offer the Palestinians a state even before a final agreement – provided Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat puts a halt to the violence.

The Sharon plan includes using a meeting with U.S. President George W. Bush on Nov. 11 – when the prime minister is due in Washington, D.C., to attend the General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities – to discuss what to do if Arafat fails to crack down on the militias operating in the territories and cannot, therefore, be considered a partner for a political deal between Israel and the Palestinians.

Sharon is offering an interim agreement, which includes a Palestinian state, even before the determination of final borders or the resolution of the Jerusalem and refugee issues.

The prime minister believes that, at present, a majority of Israelis don't support a push for a final agreement, and that Arafat is also unable to reach a deal that would end the conflict. The question troubling Sharon is whether Arafat is able, or wants, to change his current strategy of using terror and violence to achieve his goals. Sharon holds that political progress hinges on an end to the violence and incitement by the Palestinians.

The Israelis believe that by the end of November, the U.S. will wind down its operation in Afghanistan, as harsh winter conditions will prevent air campaigns or the involvement of ground forces. Under such circumstances, the U.S. administration's agenda could change and Washington could be open to new ideas for dealing with the Israeli-Palestinian crisis.

Sharon has promised the United States that he does not intend to topple the PA, nor harm Arafat personally. But it appears that the prime minister wants to reach an understanding with Bush that would allow Israel to step up the pressure on the Palestinians.

According to government sources in Jerusalem: "If Arafat is not the partner, we'll have to exact an ever-increasing price, both militarily and politically. It's important for the United States and the international community to reach this conclusion and remove his legitimate base. That way, we'll have more freedom of action – militarily, as well," the source said.

Behind closed doors, Sharon is skeptical of Foreign Minister Shimon Peres' claims that Arafat is the only partner for a political settlement and that if the PA leader were to fall, he would be replaced by Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad. Sharon believes that Arafat made a historic mistake when he refused to cease the hostilities and engage in political negotiations, knowing that Sharon could push a deal through with the support of the Israeli public.

Political sources said that the assassination of Tourism Minister Rechavam Ze'evi had interrupted a political move that the prime minister had already begun. They noted that the night before the assassination, Sharon had decided to make a speech about a Palestinian state to a gathering of Likud central committee members in Kiryat Motzkin.

The following are the main points of the Sharon plan:

- A long-term interim agreement, with no timetable, and the postponement of the Jerusalem and refugee issues
- The Palestinian state will be established before a solution to the other issues
- The Palestinian state will be demilitarized, with the Israel Defense Force controlling its borders with Egypt and Jordan and the Israeli Air Force having freedom of movement in the skies above it.

Despite terror, Israel withdraws from Bethlehem

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials have decided to withdraw troops from the West Bank city of Bethlehem, despite two Palestinian terror attacks in which five Israelis were killed.

In one attack Sunday, a Palestinian gunman killed at least four Israelis and wounded about 40 others when he sprayed automatic gunfire on a crowd waiting at a bus stop in the coastal city of Hadera.

The attack took place as Israel was poised to begin withdrawing from Bethlehem.

According to witnesses, a Palestinian gunman got out of a car and began firing at random.

Israeli police shot and killed the gunman and another Palestinian who had remained in the car.

Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for the attack, which it said was a reprisal for the slaying of its leader, Fathi Shakaki, in Malta in October 1995. That attack was blamed on the Mossad, but Israel declined to comment on whether it was behind the shooting.

A senior officer in the Israel Defense Force told Army Radio on Sunday night that the two terrorists who carried out the Hadera attack were members of the Palestinian police force and of Islamic Jihad.

Hadera, located north of Tel Aviv, is at one of Israel's narrowest points. Only seven miles from the West Bank, it has been a frequent target for attacks by Palestinian terrorists.

Earlier Sunday, Palestinian gunmen shot and killed an Israeli soldier in a drive-by shooting in Israel.

The attack took place near the West Bank city of Tulkarm, where a suspected terrorist who belonged to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement was killed a day earlier.

The terrorist was one of the Palestinian gunmen who carried out the abduction and murders of two Israeli restaurant owners last January, according to Israeli security officials quoted in the media. The man had also been involved in many shooting attacks on Israelis near Tulkarm, the officials said.

An anonymous caller told The Associated Press that the Al Aksa Brigade, which is affiliated with Fatah, killed the Israeli soldier.

Following the two terror attacks Sunday, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon convened his security cabinet to discuss how to respond.

At that meeting, Sharon, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Defense Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer agreed to continue with plans to withdraw Israeli troops from Bethlehem and from the neighbouring town of Beit Jalla.

According to Israel Radio, Ben-Eliezer believed that despite Sunday's terror attacks, the IDF should withdraw from Bethlehem and Beit Jalla because the Palestinians had maintained quiet in those areas.

Soon after the meeting, the first tanks began leaving Bethlehem.

Israel agreed to the withdrawal last Friday, when U.S. officials hosted a meeting of Israeli and Palestinian security officials.

Israel had planned to withdraw from Bethlehem on Saturday, but delayed the move, charging that the Palestinians had not fulfilled their part of the agreement to stop all gunfire and attacks against Israelis.

In its biggest operation in areas under Palestinian control since the two sides signed their first interim peace accords in 1993, Israel took up positions earlier this month in and around six of the largest Palestinian-controlled cities in the West Bank – in Bethlehem, Ramallah, Jenin, Nablus, Tulkarm and Kalkilya.

The operation was launched after the Oct. 17 assassination of Tourism Minister Rechavam Ze'evi.

U.S. President George W. Bush and a host of other U.S. officials repeatedly criticized the Israeli thrust into the Palestinian cities in the West Bank and called for an Israeli withdrawal.

The United States has been urging the two sides to reach a ceasefire to prevent Arab states from abandoning the U.S.-led international campaign against terrorism.

On Oct. 25, Israeli troops withdrew from a Palestinian village in the West Bank that they had invaded a day earlier. During the sweep through the village of Beit Rima, Israeli officials said, soldiers arrested Palestinians suspected of involvement in the Ze'evi assassination.

The withdrawal took place after soldiers carried out an operation to "prevent further terror attacks on Israeli civilians and to root out the infrastructure of terror," the army said in a statement.

ANNOUNCING

THE BRONFMAN YOUTH FELLOWSHIPS IN ISRAEL 2002

For the sixteenth consecutive summer, a group of outstanding Jewish teenagers in the U.S. and Canada, coming from a wide variety of backgrounds and entering the twelfth grade of school, will be recipients of the Bronfman Youth Fellowships*. They will spend five fulfilling weeks of study, dialogue and travel in Israel.

The Bronfman Fellows will be selected on the basis of character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities. Merit, not financial need, is the program's selection standard. Fellowship activities begin July 8th, with a return from Israel August 14th. All meals will be kosher, and Sabbath activities will be in keeping with the sanctity of the day.

Based in Jerusalem, the Fellows will engage in an intense interaction with a diverse rabbinic faculty and counselors, representing a wide range of Jewish perspectives. They will explore Jewish texts against the background of Israel's land, culture and customs ... meet with Amitei Bronfman, our Israel counterpart program ... take part, at a time of rapid change, in seminars with some of the country's leading political and cultural figures ... debate ideas and search for insights on the different ways to define oneself as a Jew today, all in an atmosphere of mutual respect and open dialogue.

The purpose: to return home with a new understanding of the myriad issues facing the Jewish people and the Jewish state, and a new appreciation of the need for dialogue among Jews of all kinds.

* Fellowships cover all expenses including roundtrip transportation between New York and Israel, room and board and travel in Israel.

Completed applications must be postmarked by January 31, 2002

A PROGRAM OF THE SAMUEL BRONFMAN FOUNDATION, INC.

In Britain, 'Kill the Jews' not considered incitement

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — The leaflets made their message perfectly clear: "The final hour will not come until the Muslims kill the Jews."

The last three words were printed in larger type than the rest of the sentence, so from a distance, it looked as if the pamphlets simply read: "Kill the Jews."

Placed on car windshields and plastered to walls, the pamphlets appeared in London's fervently Orthodox Jewish neighborhood of Stamford Hill in October 2000, just after the beginning of the Palestinian uprising.

Police caught five men in the act of distributing the leaflets, but British officials have recommended that no legal action be taken against them.

Britain's Jewish leaders are furious.

"This is a perfect example of the lack of political will to prosecute for incitement," said a spokesperson for the Community Security Trust, an organization dedicated to protecting the Jewish community. The political authorities are "backing away from the problem."

The spokesperson, who asked not to be named, added that the authorities are more reluctant to prosecute Muslims than far-right white extremists.

"There is a history of failing to get to grips with incitement on the part of the Muslim community," he said.

The Board of Deputies, the umbrella organization that represents most British Jews, is particularly upset that word of the prosecutions being dropped came just as the government proposed widening anti-incitement legislation.

Incitement to racial hatred is already illegal, and the government has proposed banning incitement to religious hatred as well. Under British law, Jews are considered a "race."

The Board and the Trust have both charged that existing hate crimes legislation is adequate to protect Jews, but that the laws are not used effectively.

In a stinging letter to Britain's attorney general, the Board's director general, Neville Nagler, wrote, "We would be interested to learn how the proposed new law would make a difference when under existing laws an overt appeal to kill members of a racial minority can be carried out with impunity."

There were 41 prosecutions for incitement between 1990 and 1997, or less than six per year.

Nagler compared the case of the five men arrested for distributing the leaflets to that of two others being prosecuted for passing out similar leaflets several days before.

"The Jewish community is extremely concerned at the failure to take action against the five men who were arrested for distributing identical material," Nagler wrote to the attorney general. "We would request an explanation," he said.

The five men who were arrested early on Oct. 8, 2000, on "suspicion of distributing anti-Semitic literature" – they were caught with the leaflets in their car, a police spokesperson said – were released on bail and told to appear in court on Nov. 3, 2000.

They never appeared, and police did not pursue the matter.

The Crown Prosecution Service, the body that advises police whether there is enough evidence to prosecute, recommended in April against legal action.

The service does not publicize its decisions, however, so the issue languished until a reporter for the London-based Jewish Chronicle remembered the case and made some inquiries.

"There was not enough evidence to go forward with prosecution," the service told JTA.

A police spokesperson said that because the leaflets were distributed in a predominantly Jewish area and would be seen mostly by Jews, the service ruled that the leaflets were unlikely to stir up racial hatred against Jews.

The spokesperson added that the police had wanted to prosecute the men.

The Jewish community learned of the decision through a recent report in the Jewish Chronicle. Nagler wrote to the attorney general within days.

The Trust is particularly concerned because the leaflets were apparently produced by Al Muhajiroun, an extremist Muslim group with strong support in Britain.

Its Web site has promoted Holocaust denial, and its leader, Sheik Omar Bakri Muhammad, is under suspicion of incitement.

British Home Secretary David Blunkett, who is responsible for domestic security issues, told the BBC that Muhammad is being watched closely.

"We monitor carefully everything that he is saying, who he is inciting, and work out carefully at what point it would be productive to act so he is prevented from doing so," Blunkett said in a radio interview.

The Trust hopes that the authorities are taking the issue seriously, its spokesperson said.

"There is a direct correlation between the amount of incitement and violence against Jews," he said.

GA aims to renew federations' focus

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Just as tourism and the North American economy have taken a hit following the Sept. 11 terrorism attacks, the Jewish federation system's annual gathering is expected to be smaller than in recent years.

But organizers of the United Jewish Communities General Assembly (GA) – slated for Nov. 9 to 13 in Washington, D.C. – and several federation leaders hope the Jewish community's desire to come together in a time of crisis and confusion will outweigh the fear factor.

Federation leaders are urging people to come this year to stand up to terrorism. They say the gathering, which will feature an address by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, provides a much-needed opportunity for Jewish leaders to regroup, strategize and forge a consensus on how federations should respond to new political realities.

Registration is currently about 60 percent of normal levels. According to UIA Canada, some 200 Canadians are expected to attend the conference, approximately the same number that attended last year's assembly in Chicago.

"People don't want to fly, and people are worried about being in a large room with Jews," said Bruce Arbit, an officer at large of the Milwaukee Jewish Federation and a member of the Jewish Agency for Israel's board of governors.

"I don't think there's a reason for anyone to be concerned about going to such an event," said Arbit, who will attend the GA and was in Jerusalem this week for a Jewish Agency meeting. "I don't think it's a sound fear. But I am hearing it."

GA director David Frank said he had heard similar comments along with concerns that Washington, D.C., may be a terrorist target. He said the event will have stringent security that will match or exceed measures taken last year.

Those measures, instituted because of tensions stemming from the Palestinian conflict, were considerably higher than in previous years. UJC officials consulted with local police, the FBI and Israel's Shin Bet domestic security service, Frank said.

Last year's GA attracted more than 4,500 people. The high turnout was widely attributed to heightened concerns about Israel, which had just seen its peace efforts with the Pale[illegible] tinians go up in the smoke of the intifadah.

After Sept. 11, leaders say this year's GA is especially critical.

"The GA this year is probably more important than ever because of the wide sense of isolation today in America," said Robert Aronson, executive vice-president of the Jewish Federation of Metropolitan Detroit.

"It's important for us to come together and talk with each other about what our communities are doing, what our futures look like, how we're dealing with the crisis, and how we're going to be dealing with Israel relative to Israel's current needs and in reaction to this global terror war," said Aronson, who is trying to bring a larger delegation than normal from Detroit.

The GA's schedule of events has been modified in response to the new situation. Sessions on terrorism in the Middle East have been expanded to include terrorism in the United States, and several new sessions will explore what traditional Jewish texts say about violence and terror.

Frank emphasized that the GA won't deal only with terrorism and security.

Beyond the GA, it is not clear how the war on terrorism will affect the federation system's agenda.

Stephen Hoffman, who is chief executive officer of the UJC and will add the title of president in November, said he does not think the Sept. 11 attacks should dramatically alter the federation system's focus.

"Our No. 1 priority is acting normal," he said. "I believe that our environment has changed, but our mission hasn't.

"Our fundamental mission is to help people in need, and people are in need in St. Petersburg, Russia, and in St. Petersburg, Fla. The greatest gift we can give to terrorists is to allow our system of services around the world to be disrupted."

However, Hoffman said, the UJC needs to "redefine the role" of its Israel solidarity advocacy, "because the kind of case we were trying to make for Israel kind of got made.

"There's tremendous support for Israel in the United States currently," he said, but "we have to make sure the specious linkages between Israel and the terrorist attacks are exposed, that the real background of why America faces this evil is known."

The Week in Israel

Oct. 22

• Israel's military operations in Bethlehem drew protests from church leaders who accused the IDF of indiscriminately firing at church sites. Israel denied the accusations, saying that Palestinian gunmen used churches to attack Israeli targets and deliberately drew return fire there.

(Vatican official, Pietro Sambi, subsequently led hundreds of marchers through Bethlehem, calling on Israel to withdraw from "so sacred a place... which is the heart of all Christianity.")

Oct. 23

• Israel rebuffed a call from the U.S. State Department to withdraw "immediately from all Palestinian-controlled areas." Israel said it had no intention of re-occupying West Bank land but that it was responding to concrete terror threats.

• Palestinian snipers fired at Jerusalem's Gilo neighbourhood.

Oct. 24

• The Knesset held a special memorial session to mark the end of the shivah period for Rechavam Ze'evi.

• Morocco announced it is severing ties with Israel.

• Police believe Jewish gunmen were behind a shooting attack near Hebron in which six Palestinians were wounded.

Oct. 25

• Haim Ramon and Shlomo Ben-Ami suggested that Israel announce its intention to withdraw from a vast majority of the West Bank and Gaza and then hand the territory over to U.S.-led "international management."

Oct. 26

• Israel announced the arrest of 42 terrorists during its week-long incursions into West Bank terrorist strongholds. At least 12 Palestinians were also killed in the IDF operations.

Memory: alas, in short supply

"Our memory is short and it grows shorter under the rapidity of the assault of events."

Things have sped up a great deal since the famous American literary critic Lionel Trilling wrote those words in 1952. And memory, it seems, is in shorter supply than ever, especially for people who should know better.

For instance, during a panel discussion on CBC Radio's "This Morning" (Oct. 21), Rosemary Hollis of the prestigious London-based Royal Institute for International Affairs raised the issue of the Mitchell Commission report as it pertains to moving Israelis and Palestinians back to the negotiating table. Forgetting details, Hollis criticized Israel by mistakenly stating that Mitchell calls for negotiations while a ceasefire is being implemented. A second panellist, Norman Spector, Canada's former ambassador to Israel, reminded Hollis about the correct sequence of events.

According to Reports

Mitchell is crystal clear that an end to violence must be an "unconditional" and "immediate" first step, to be followed by a time-out, then a period of confidence-building, and only then a return to negotiations. Until the violence ends – until Arafat reins in the extremists, re-arrests the terrorists earlier released from jail and ends the anti-Israel incitement – there can be no hope of progress.

Anyone who criticizes Israel for responding to Palestinian violence should read the Mitchell report, take it to heart, and place the onus for stopping the violence where it belongs: on Arafat. Indeed, Sharon is on firm ground for repeatedly calling on Arafat to end the violence before negotiations can resume.

At least Hollis was correct in noting that the Mitchell report is "what we're all hanging on to as the way forward." But this "hanging on" also requires us to remember the report's specific content.

For example, Mitchell also calls upon Israel to halt all settlement activity. But this step is part of the second-phase confidence building measure, not a precondition. It is not linked in any way with the essential precondition of a complete cessation of violence.

Nor does the Mitchell report call for an international observer force as the third panellist, Richard Gwyn of the Toronto Star, asserted. George Mitchell himself said on PBS last May: "We turned down the Palestinian request, which was their principal request, for an international protection force in the region." Israel could never have accepted the report in full, as it has, had such a condition been attached.

Footnote: The award for the most dead-on comment of the week goes to Samuel Segev, veteran Israeli journalist and author, for his observation about a U.S. double-standard in its treatment of Israel: "The U.S. prefers Peres' approach in the Middle East, while applying Sharon's policies in Afghanistan." (Winnipeg Free Press, Oct. 24).

U.S. takes Arab hypocrisy in stride

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Three weeks into the war in Afghanistan, Arab states are showing little enthusiasm for the United States' military campaign.

Arab leaders generally back efforts to uproot and destroy Osama bin Laden's Afghan-based Al Qaeda terrorist network, said to have masterminded the Sept. 11 attacks in Manhattan and Washington, D.C.

But beyond this focused objective, which the United States has yet to achieve, Arab leaders have studiously distanced themselves from the war effort.

During the 1991 Gulf War, touched off by Iraq's invasion and occupation of Kuwait, Arab nations contributed men and materiel. This time, not a single Arab nation has committed troops or equipment.

Under American pressure, Arab states joined the loose anti-bin Laden coalition, thereby providing the United States with the political cover deemed necessary to confront Al Qaeda and its patron, the fiercely Islamic fundamentalist Taliban regime in Kabul.

But the Arab world holds that the problem of global terrorism should be addressed multilaterally by the United Nations rather than unilaterally by the United States.

Its position owes much to the fact that anti-American feeling, as well as pro-bin Laden sentiment, is running high in Arab capitals.

It is clear that Arab leaders, most of whom were not chosen in free and democratic elections, fear the wrath of their own people.

And, judging by an Oct. 10 resolution issued by the Organization of the Islamic Conference, which supposedly represents 1.2 billion Muslims, Islamic public opinion rejects the targeting of any Muslim and Arab state under "the pretext of fighting terrorism."

In practice, therefore, Arab regimes oppose hitting countries like Iraq or Syria, both of which are on a U.S. list of states practising or condoning terrorism.

With Israel obviously in mind, Arab leaders distinguish between terrorism and resistance to occupation.

They can tolerate strikes against Al Qaeda, which despises secular Arab governments and advocates their overthrow. But Arab leaders draw the line at actions aimed at groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad, which have killed scores of Israelis since the outbreak of the Palestinian uprising in September 2000.

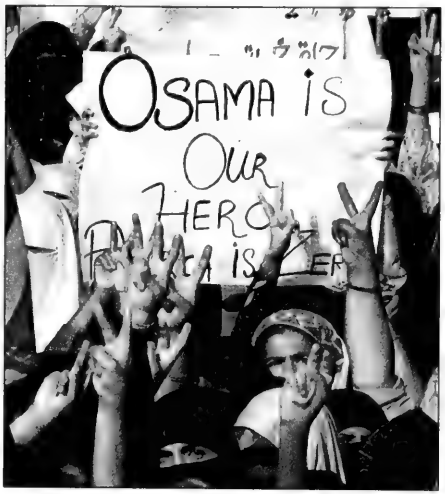
Anxious to preserve the creaky coalition, the United States has not only taken Arab hypocrisy in stride, it has also leaned heavily on Israel to restrain itself in the face of Palestinian armed provocations.

On Oct. 17, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, avenging Israel's killing of its secretary-general in August, assassinated Rechavam Ze'evi, the hardline Israeli minister of tourism. By way of retaliation, the Israeli army mounted its biggest operation in Palestinian autonomous areas since the 1993 Oslo peace process.

Last week, in deference to Arab sensibilities, the Bush administration called for an immediate Israeli withdrawal from Palestinian towns in Area A, a renewal of the oft-broken ceasefire and a resumption of peace talks. In addition, the United States urged the Palestinian Authority to arrest Ze'evi's murderers and, in line with the Tenet recommendations, to rein in terrorism.

Yet, for all its efforts to appease the Arabs and thus retain their support for the struggle in Afghanistan, the United States has received scant payback from them.

Saudi Arabia, for example, has shown its true colours during this crisis, having been revealed as a patently unreliable ally.



Supporters of Osama bin Laden [RNS photo]

The Saudis, whose real attitude toward international terrorism is passive at best, refuse to allow American offensive operations from their soil. And together with other Gulf states, Saudi Arabia has declined to freeze the assets of bin Laden – a Saudi – and his cohorts.

Furthermore, the Saudis have so far refused to co-operate fully with a U.S. investigation of the 19 Arab hijackers – 15 of whom were Saudi nationals – who commandeered two commercial planes and crashed them into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Clearly, the Saudis are fairweather allies.

Central Asian Jews on frontlines concerned for future

By LEV GORODETSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — The overwhelming support that Jews in Central Asia have for their countries' participation in the U.S.-led airstrikes against Afghanistan is not creating any troubles with their Muslim countrymen, say Jewish leaders in the region.

But given the tenuous state of relations between Jews and Muslims in the area, this assessment could soon change.

"There have been no acts of anti-Semitism recently. The situation is stable," Roman Bensman of Tashkent, the capital of Uzbekistan, said, praising Uzbek President Islam Karimov.

"All local Jews side with President Karimov in his support of the U.S. action in Afghanistan and in his crackdown on the Islamic extremists inside the country," added Marek Fazilov, a leader of the Jewish community in Tashkent.

Karimov does indeed appear committed to maintaining friendly relations with his country's Jews, and to his crackdown on Islamic fundamentalism.

But the reality for the estimated 50,000 to 60,000 Jews in the region – split between Bukharan Jews, who have long been in the area, and Ashkenazic Jews, who settled here in the past 75 years – is, and long has been, far more complex.

"There has never been any real anti-Semitism here, probably because we have very close links with the locals, and they perceive us" as their own people, Boris Borukhov, a leader of the 2,000-person Jewish community in Tajikistan, said, referring to the attitude of the Tajik population toward Bukharan Jews.

Bukharan Jews, who are descendants of the ancient Persian Jewish community and speak Farsi, are believed to have settled in what is now called Tajikistan as early as the fifth century BCE.

During the first few centuries of the Common Era, they moved north and eventually formed large communities in what is now Uzbekistan, southern Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan and Turkmenistan.

In the following centuries, Bukharan Jews enjoyed a generally peaceful co-existence alongside their Muslim neighbours.

Manifestations of anti-Semitism, including forced conversions to Islam and even cases of blood libel, were not unknown in Central Asia, but they were far less frequent and less numerous than in the Slavic parts of the Russian Empire and the Soviet Union.

Bukharan Jews long made up the majority of Jews in the region, but after the mass emigration to Israel and the United States in the 1990s, they are now only an estimated one-third of Central Asia's 60,000 Jews.

Many of the remaining two-thirds are the Ashkenazic Jews who settled here during World War II after fleeing Poland and western parts of the Soviet Union.

Many of these Jews were skilled professionals – in such fields as medicine, engineering, science and music – who, after the war, formed the backbone of the local intelligentsia and greatly enhanced the level of culture and technology in the region.

But as far as many ethnic Uzbeks, Tajiks and Kazakhs are concerned, the Ashkenazic Jews were Russian colonizers.

After the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, nationalists in Central Asia started to press for the expulsion of all Russian speakers, no matter what their ethnic origin.

As a result, 80 percent of these Ashkenazi Jews left during the last decade for Israel, Russia, United States and Germany.

Those who stayed occasionally meet with animosity.

Maria Semenova, a university instructor, says she was recently harassed and beaten by ethnic Uzbeks in a Tashkent bus on her way to class.

When she appealed to the police, the officers held her until late at night at the station, planted drugs in her bag and tried to squeeze a $300 bribe out of her before freeing her, she said.

According to her, the police said, "What are you Jews still doing here? We're the masters of the place. You have nothing to do here."

"There is no state anti-Semitism," Mikhail Degtiar, a sociology professor, said. "But on the everyday level, there is a permanent pressure. All Russian speakers live in a state of a constant fear. Besides the Islamic terror, there is the terror of the authorities against everybody."

Degtiar would know. Until recently, he was a Jewish community leader in Uzbekistan. But after the authorities pressed charges against him for an article he published in a journal in which he predicted the end of Jewish life in Uzbekistan, he fled to the United States.

Jewish leaders report that Muslim-Jewish relations have not deteriorated, but some worry that tensions could mount as the war in Afghanistan intensifies.

"The situation is stable, there are no anti-Semitic outbursts, but there is an uneasy feeling because the war is drawing nearer," said Rosa Fish, leader of the 2,500-strong Jewish community in Kyrgyzstan, considered the most democratic country in the region.

Indeed, reports from provincial cities in Tajikistan say Islamic activists are distributing leaflets blaming the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on Zionists who wanted the United States to launch a war against Islam. These leaflets echo a lie that has gained widespread currency in the Arab and Muslim worlds.

The unease that some Jews are feeling is not the only problem in the region, according to some human rights groups.

Though Uzbek President Karimov is viewed by the U.S. administration as the main guarantor of stability in the region and a crucial ally, some of these rights groups are not happy with his methods.

"We are very concerned about the situation for Jews in Central Asia as Islamic fundamentalism becomes increasingly strong," said Nikolai Butkevich of the Washington-based Union of Councils for Jews in the Former Soviet Union.

New study aimed at preventing type 2 diabetes

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Researchers hope that a new study will lead to the prevention of the development of type 2 adult-onset diabetes in those at risk for the disease.

Participants in the DREAM study (Diabetes REduction Assessment with ramipril and rosiglitazone Medications) will receive either the drug ramipril, and/or rosiglitazone, or a placebo, as well as lifestyle education.

Bernard Zinman, professor of medicine at the University of Toronto, senior scientist at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, director of the Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes and holder of the Sam and Judy Pencer Family Chair in Diabetes at Mount Sinai Hospital, is principal investigator.

Instances of diabetes are reaching epidemic proportions, Zinman said. He estimates that 1.5 million people have diabetes now and that by 2016, there will be another million cases.

In addition to the baby boomer generation getting to 55, the age at which one is more susceptible, there are more obese people because of our sedentary lifestyle, Zinman said.

Certain groups, such as aboriginal, Asian and South Asian peoples, seem to have a genetic susceptibility to diabetes, he said. "Statistics show that they have five times the national average of cases."

While Ashkenazi Jews appear to have a slightly greater risk of developing the disease, surprisingly, Zinman said, there is not a lot of information on the subject.

The DREAM study will screen approximately 40,000 people worldwide, about 12,000 of them in Canada, for impaired glucose tolerance (the precursor of diabetes). Of these people, 4,000, including 1,200 Canadians, will go on to participate in the study.

Those not eligible, or who decide not to take part, will be monitored yearly, and after about five years, will have a repeat health assessment and be checked for diabetes or impaired glucose tolerance.

You are at risk for type 2 diabetes and thus eligible for the study if you are:

- 30 years of age or older;
- have a family history of diabetes;
- are overweight;
- have high blood pressure;
- have given birth to a baby that weighed more than nine pounds;
- had diabetes during pregnancy;
- have ever been told that your blood sugar is a bit high, or that you have impaired glucose tolerance;
- are of aboriginal, Latin American, African, Asian or Hispanic descent.

You may not take part if you already have diabetes, or if you are pregnant or intend to become pregnant in the next five years.

Ramipril, which is used to treat hypertension and kidney disease, and rosiglitazone, which sensitizes the tissues to insulin creation, are both well established medications, Zinman emphasized, with few side effects.

The study is not merely an academic exercise, said Zinman. Complications of diabetes can be very severe, including kidney disease, vision loss, heart disease and stroke, and foot problems that can lead to amputation of a toe, foot or leg. There is also greater susceptibility to infections.

For more information or to register, call Sue at the Mount Sinai Hospital Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes at 416-586-8775.

WINTER FASHION

Fashion tips for the plus size women

The Top Ten Trends for Fall/Winter 2001 by Toni+

1. The Real Thing – Pleather is Extinct...leather and suede in some fashions is the must have.

2. The Fashion Comeback of the Decade...suits were never better.

3. Join The Club...tweeds, herringbone, houndstooth and glen check plaids, not just for menswear anymore.

4. KISS– Keep It Simply Stylish...basic black and white pairings are the ultimate day to night combo.

5. The Luxurious Touch...faux or real fur collar and cuffs are the latest hot accessory item.

6. Knit 1 Purl 2...solid head to toe knitwear outfits featuring ribbed long cardigans over turtlenecks, pants and skirts.

7. Optical Illusion...blouses and shirts in bold optic patterns and stripes add flare and a dash of daring to the basics.

8. Curves Ahead...curve hugging soft and luxurious cashmere, mohair angora or lambswool sweaters and cosy cardigans are an essential fall look.

KISS: Keep It Simply Stylish, Toni + advises.

9. Wrap It Up...playful plaid oversize wraps are the immediate answer to upgrade bland monochromatic solids to ultra-stylish chic.

10. Can't Have Just One...tailored, shaped silhouettes in long coats of alpaca, tweed and subtle plaids with fur or leather trim are a cold weather necessity, but who can resist a stunning shearling or leather top coat, the to die for choice of the season.

Making The Most of Your Figure This Season

Hints to help you decide which of this season's top trends will work for you!

Fuller on top or middle: Go for fine flat weight lambswool, angora or mohair sweater paired up with a herringbone tweed pant or skirt. Refrain from chunky cable knits that are top heavy. Other good choices are fingertip length streamlined jackets with clean zip closures or single-breasted jackets, loud printed tops, and the new fur collars are not for you – but fur cuffs on a suit would be tres chic!

Bigger bottom: Opt for solid head to toe colour, or if a pattern is drop dead gorgeous – keep it discreet! (Large patterns draw attention to the hip area as does wearing a contrasting top to bottom). This season's large fur collar accessories are perfect for you – the fullness at the top will balance off your bottom assets nicely!

Full all over: Meet your match in a slightly textured suit. A softly tailored jacket with matching slim skirt or pant will elongate your body, with flattering results. The key here is to stay away from hard, unforgiving fabrics and look for softly structured (but not clingy!) materials that drape and mold from top to bottom.

Again, monochromatic colour is far more flattering than bold patterns – and pick an exceptional accessory to spice things up! Also be very cautious with your accessories...you don't want to suffer from accessory overload.

The wonder outfit for all figures: The long knit cardigan teamed up with matching turtleneck and bottom in a solid head to toe colouration works for every figure type and is our pick for "outfit of the season!"

How dramatically our lives have changed since the horrendous tragedy of Sept. 11! This devastating event has changed our lives forever. Terrorism shakes the ground we walk on, but walk we will, with courage and fortitude. The important thing is to live every day with passion, and treat yourself to something special often. Stay centered with serenity and enjoy each day with continued care and self-regard. Put your best self forward and every morning look in the mirror and say, "Hello Gorgeous."

NEWS, NEWS, NEWS!!!

Housed in SpaMedica's new Infinite Vitality Clinic is a remarkable option for cosmetic surgery – its name – Pan G. This 10-week non-surgical procedure is tailored to each patient's individual needs, says Dr. Steve Mulholland, director of the clinic (66 Avenue Rd., Toronto). The results can be minimized pores, a finer, more even skin texture, skin tone, reduced sun damage, diminished lines and wrinkles and a significant (20 to 30 percent) elevate of the facial soft tissue. Brow, jowls, cheeks and neck are all improved. In short, this advanced technology promises to dramatically rejuvenate all layers of the face – a real gift for all ages!

Don't miss the New You 2002 Show. To be held at the Toronto Convention Centre Jan. 11-13, it promises to be the largest cosmetic enhancement, anti-aging show of its kind in North America. Featured will be 33 of Toronto and North America's pre-eminent physicians and dentists. In addition, hourly demonstrations of the latest beauty, hair and fashion treatments will provide you with unlimited beauty knowledge. Tickets are available at Ticketmaster; for more information check out www.newyou.ca.

"This feels like heaven" are the best words to describe The Stillwater Spa at the Park Hyatt. They offer a vast variety of services, and their methods are very detailed. The talented staff is not only efficient but includes extra soothing techniques to help you destress. The environment is almost hypnotic. Let your mind, body and soul recapture their unique sparkle.

Chilly winter palettes are cool, sleek and very sexy. Have fun and enjoy all the festivities this holiday season. Glisten your lips with lots of kissable gloss and paint your nails and eyes with sumptuous sparkle and glitter. Exfoliate and moisturize your skin regularly and treat yourself to a luxury treatment such as a facial or massage or both. It is too cold not to.

EYES: The new streamlined brow pencil from MAC is totally amazing. It makes good sense, is easy to apply and looks natural.

Underwear for lashes from Origins is the best lash builder I have seen in awhile. It helps to lift and lengthen and floats on like lingerie. Glossy shadows are very popular, but quite frankly I find them too sticky.

Check out HydraFresh Circle Eraser from L'Oreal to help minimize dark circles and soften the skin around the eye area.

LIPS: MAC's latest lip pencils in the colour Girlfriend and Foxy Lady are lots of fun. And while we are doing MAC, check out the all-over glitter – it's very festive – no wonder it is in the Black Tied Collection.

Two creamy lipsticks nestle inside the cutest golden saddle box from Dior. This brilliant little jewel is so practical it is designed so you can wear it on your belt.

Another little gem this season is a trio of passionate new reds in a gorgeous sleek case from Shiseido's Clé de Peau Beauté Collection. Gloss, moisture and colour combine to produce a luxurious satin finish and its name is Rouge de Luxe.

HAIR: Check out Salon Daniel (79 Yorkville Ave., Toronto) for the coolest colour technique. It is absolutely stunning. According to Daniel, the look is like a slice of pie. For instance, if you have blonde hair, you might have a few slices of dark, and if you are brunette, you might get a shot of cool light. No, it is not like highlights or streaks or chunking; it is clearly "slicing." The effect enhances your features and adds texture and volume. Hair this winter has more volume, Daniel explains, but is still a long way from big hair.

Kerastase presents Oleo-Relax, a system that contains shampoo, a creamy masque and a leave-in controlling texturizer. All combined, they leave your hair shiny, voluminous and simply gorgeous. Redken unveils new technology for long hair designed specifically for those who want to maintain or grow long hair. The line consists of a shampoo, conditioner and heat-treat, heat-activated leave-in treatment. It focuses on keeping the ends strong and pliable.

Now Rover can smell good with Oh My Dog! available at Eatons and Holt Renfrew.

Beautiful fragrances from Castelbajac.

L'Oreal's Liss Extreme – shampoo, moisturizing mask and a leave-in treatment – will transform your hair into a picture of health and shine

FRAGRANCE: Chanel introduces two beautiful Coco Mademoiselle body products: Fresh Moisture Mist accompanied by an ever-so-fresh body lotion. This little duo is exquisite. Direct from Paris, Oh my Dog and Oh my Cat are scents designed specifically to enthrall your animal. They are both great and the bottles that house them are just as terrific. Both are available at Eatons and Holt Renfrew.

Elizabeth Arden gets a little spicy with the new Spiced Green Tea Scent Spray and Comforting Body Cream – nothing could be cozier on a cold winter night by the fireplace.

Histoire de Parfums is a series of scents that are fresh and inviting. From room scents to perfume there is something to suit all. Their "naturelle" scent is actually great for the whole family.

Toronto's Eatons downtown store welcomes a brand new fragrance from the fashion house of Jean-Charles de Castelbajac in Paris. "Castelbajac" is an exciting floral liquid that is both innocent and sexy at the same time. And, wait until you see the bottles – spectacular!

L'eau De Cheap and Chic from Moschino is lots of fun yet quite sophisticated. Its freshness floats in a dreamy world of flowers and fruit.

Winter Fashion

No animals were harmed in the making of this coat

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

With the winter season about to rear its frigid head, fashionistas are checking out their wardrobes. Something warm is definitely required.

Perhaps something soft and luxurious like a full-length mink coat? Or what about a hooded leopard jacket or a lamb collar and cuffs to refurbish that old knit suit? We all love the lavish, sensual feel of fur, and the animal look continues to be a hot item on the fashion scene.

But many conscientious men and women are turning down animal skin garments in favour of clothing made from fur substitutes. And manufacturers have developed substitutes made from synthetic materials that looks and feel like real fur.

"The fashion industry took steps to appease the public and designers as well," said one representative of a Montreal fabric wholesaler.

For years now, the fashion industry has been offering consumers options for luxurious, fashionable outerwear such as full-length mink coats, beaver jackets, and sable wraps made with 100 percent faux fur. The untrained eye may not even be able to tell the difference.

Polyester and acrylic are used to make the faux fur. Polyester makes a less expensive imitation fur that is most often used as lining or as trimming to enhance vests, coats and jackets. It's also used for making pet beds, throws, stuffed toys, chairs and car-seat covers. On the other hand, fake-fur fabric made using acrylic results in a higher-end product that has a more nicely finished sheen. When made into coats and jackets, it creates a very real and luxurious looking garment.

The fabric industry has also developed printing and jacquarding equipment that allows manufacturers to produce other kinds of fur alternatives – including imitation sable, white or black sheared beaver, raccoon or coyote – that look and feel like the real thing. Other animal skins that can be imitated in faux fur include fox, tiger, ocelot and pelted mink skins. These various fabrics are then designed into garments, such as boleros, capes, wraps, coats, jackets, hats and vests, for men, women and children.

And all without harming a single animal. Faux fur fashions made with quality workmanship are as glamorous as the real thing, whether they have classic or fun styling. The end products look and feel like natural animal skins, yet they are more affordable and, of course, much more animal friendly.

Jeanne Beker launches her own clothing brand

A chunky knit black/ivory tweed sweater and lambskin leather knee-length A-line skirt in black.

Jeanne Beker, Canada's internationally renowned host and segment producer of Fashion Television recently launched her own signature of stylish clothing.

The line was created with the intent to help simplify women's lives who, much like Beker, multi-task and work with extremely tight schedules. The JeanneBeker clothing line features wear-anywhere pieces that fit a range of figures, travel well, complement existing wardrobes and reflect quality and style.

The line is available exclusively at Eatons stores across Canada.

Highlights from the JeanneBeker clothing line include: Pinstripe and techno-fabric suiting; lambskin leather separates; matte jersey co-ordinates; chunky-knit sweaters; fitted tactel tops; and a cashmere wrap trench coat.

Remaining true to her calling, Beker's role in the project was as "editor." With her 16 years of trend-watch expertise and a lifetime of experience as a "real woman," Beker worked closely with the designers to develop her first collection.

A cashmere wrap trench coat in chamois, goes well over a silk/lycra neck sleeveless top in cardinal red and techno fabric seamless boot-cut pant in black.

Festive evening supports breast cancer services

Bayview Village Shopping Centre is hosting a festive evening in support of North York General Hospital for Breast Cancer Services.

The evening will feature "after hours" shopping with in-store discounts, a silent auction, music and entertainment, and a raffle with a grand prize of $10,000 in gift certificates.

Ticket prices are $50, and tax receipts for a portion of the price will be provided. Proceeds will go to support the purchase of a new digital mammography machine.

Sunday, Nov. 25 at 6:30 p.m., at Bayview Ave. and Sheppard Ave. For tickets and information, call 416-226-2003.

TV documentaries deal with survivors' return home

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Holocaust survivors return to places of their youth, emotions usually run high.

Two forthcoming Vision TV documentaries, Out of the Fire and Rendezvous, deal with this aspect of the Holocaust.

The films, timed for Holocaust Education Week, focus on Faye (Fanya) Schulman, a former partisan, and Edwin Grossman, who owes his survival to a Christian family in France. Schulman and Grossman reside in Canada today.

Apart from being a member of a Russian partisan band during the war, Schulman was a photographer whose pictures graphically recall a story of endurance and courage in the face of immense odds.

Shelley Saywell's 60-minute documentary, Out of the Fire, is narrated by Martha Henry. It tells two distinct but interrelated tales.

It describes the life of a Jewish partisan fighting the Germans and just trying to survive amid a harsh landscape.

And it takes us to Lenin, the village in what is now Belarus where Shulman was born, raised and, shatteringly enough, witnessed the death of her family by a Nazi firing squad.

Scheduled to be broadcast on Monday, Nov. 5 at 9.m. and 11 p.m., Out of the Fire skillfully mixes these stories in a film that jumps from the present to the past and back again.

After 55 years, Shulman– who bears an uncanny resemblance to Madeleine Albright, the former American secretary of state – returns to Lenin, a drab, forgettable burg which summons up a rush of memories, good and bad.

She finds nothing of consequence, not even her parents' and sisters' graves. At a black granite monument, which honours the war dead, she breaks down and cries.

In a Minsk museum, however, Schulman stumbles upon a photograph of herself as a partisan.

Then she visits her old partisan camp in the forest and is reunited with a Jewish woman who fought alongside her.

Still later, Shulman meets her former commander, a grizzled and bemedalled veteran with whom she reminisces at an emotional banquet, and tours a museum where her precious photographs are on display.

A plucky lady, she learned photography from her brother, and this skill saved her life. Without it, as we discover, a local Nazi commander would not have spared her.

For Schulman, the Holocaust began in August 1942, three months after the German occupying force established a ghetto for local Jews, who comprised about half of Lenin's population.

On a sombre summer day in that month, some 2,000 Jews, including her immediate family, were methodically mowed down by gunfire.

She watched the massacre from the attic of a synagogue.

Shortly afterward, she joined the partisans, working as a nurse in a makeshift hospital deep in the woods and then as a combatant.

" It was almost impossible to survive," she says, referring to the terrible conditions, the cold and the constant presence of enemy patrols.

We're told that it was "safer" for a Jewish partisan to conceal his or her Jewish identity. Anti-Semitism appears to have been rife among the partisans. Schulman stops short of disclosing whether she took that precaution as well.

Faye Schulman

Throughout her ordeal, she took invaluable photographs of her fellow fighters. These stark black and white photos add poignancy and depth to Out of the Fire.

The film has a happy ending. Schulman met her husband, also a partisan, in 1944. In 1948, four years after being married, they immigrated to Canada, where they opened a hardware store, settled into a comfortable middle-class existence and raised several children.

Rendezvous, which will be aired on Thursday, Nov. 8 at 9 p.m. and 11 p.m., follows Grossman and his two daughters, Jacqueline and Marcy, as they visit La Varenne, a town which sheltered him during the darkest days of the war.

He and his family left their home in Berlin after the rise of the Nazis, fleeing to France. They lived in a variety of cities before settling in Paris.

Through a Roman Catholic priest active in the French resistance movement, Grossman's father was able to temporarily place Edwin and his sister with a number of foster families.

Finally, the priest found a family willing to put them up on a more or less permanent basis. Thanks to them, the Grossman children muddled through the war.

Now, some 50 years later, Grossman, accompanied by his two grown daughters, revisits the charming town of La Varenne.

Toronto filmmaker chronicles plight of 'Cameroon caviar'

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Bushmeat, an hour-long television documentary soon to air on the Discovery Channel, is a taut, riveting expose of the illicit trade in gorilla and chimpanzee meat in Cameroon and other countries of Central Africa.

Toronto filmmaker Dawna Treibicz defied the odds to make this film about a subject that many in Africa previously considered as taboo for discussion. Although – as the film puts it – the world's last sizeable wild population of great apes is "being eaten by their closest relatives, right to the verge of extinction," no one before Treibicz had ever won the approval of an African government to document the problem on film.

Dawna Treibicz

Remarkably, Treibicz even managed to get Cameroonian officials to talk about the problem for the first time on camera. She considers it a hopeful sign that something may be done to turn around this ecological disaster before it is too late.

Dubbed "Cameroon caviar", primate flesh is regarded as an exotic delicacy by enough people in Africa and Europe that there's a lucrative market for it.

No one knows the full extent of the problem, but in Cameroon alone, some 800 gorillas are reportedly hunted down annually from a total population of about 10,000 that still inhabit Central Africa's shrinking rain forest, which itself is facing destruction from the axe and chainsaw.

"At the rate they're being slaughtered, we predict [the apes] may be extinct in about 10 years," Treibicz said. "Some people say eight years, some say 20 years. We really don't know how long they've got."

Using hidden cameras, the documentary shows how easy it is to visit a bushmeat market and purchase steaks, organs, limbs and other pieces of the endangered animals.

Bushmeat also follows Canadian medical ethicist Dr. Kerry Bowman, and other concerned environmentalists as they travel to various tribal settlements in Cameroon, rescuing orphaned chimpanzees from captivity and trying to return them back to the wild.

The film has a fascinating sequence detailing the remarkable ability of gorillas and chimps to use sign language to communicate with humans. By such means, it easily persuades us – just as local ecological workers persuade tribal schoolchildren – that these hairy primates must not be considered fair game, and that they're too much like us to put on our dinner plates.

Treibicz, who graduated from York University in theatre studies, has been producing and directing television films for 20 years, usually in the subject areas of current affairs, arts, and what she calls "investigative advocacy." Bushmeat was her first nature documentary, she said, and one of the most difficult films she has yet made.

She did not travel to Africa in advance of the film. "If I had gone to do a survey trip before the shoot, I would not have gone back. I couldn't have imagined how difficult it was, trying to tell a story about an illegal trade in a country [Cameroon] that was reputed to be the most highly corrupt on the entire continent."

Over the four years it took to make the film, including six weeks on location, the logistical challenges of bringing a large film crew and entourage to sub-Saharan Africa sometimes seemed so overwhelming that at one point she considered giving up. Her mother, a Holocaust survivor, steeled her resolve by telling her, "If you don't go, you could be missing the biggest adventure in your life."

Treibicz has many ideas for new documentaries, including one about the Serpapinto, a ship on which a boatload of European refugees made an arduous journey from Lisbon to America during World War II; some eventually settled in Montreal. But even veteran filmmakers like Treibicz find it hard to get funding from broadcasters for new projects.

"It's sometimes difficult to find the right match for the story that you want to tell," she said.

Jane Goodall, the renowned anthropologist, honoured Treibicz by introducing Bushmeat at a private screening in Toronto in October. Television viewers can see the documentary when it airs on the Discovery Channel on Sunday, Nov. 4 at 8 p.m. EDT.

Film explores fascism in pre-war Britain

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Stephen Frears' newest film, Liam, which opened at the Carlton Theatre on Oct. 26, zeroes in on the relentless economic forces that made fascism such an appealing ideology to some in Depression-ravaged Britain.

Set mainly in a grim tenement in the bleak port of Liverpool, it revolves around an Irish Catholic working-class family whose livelihood, tenuous at the best, is shattered by the closure of a local shipyard owned by a Jewish family.

The Sullivans flail around in desperation as their vulnerable little universe disintegrates in the face of circumstances beyond their control.

Dad (Ian Hart), the proud breadwinner, turns to the British Union of Fascists, the so-called Blackshirts, for succor.

Being an instinctive anti-Semite who thoughtlessly tosses off epithets like "bleedin' Jews" and "Jew- bastard" to explain his sudden joblessness, he is a likely recruit to the ranks of homegrown fascists.

Con (David Hart), a budding socialist, challenges his father's political certitudes, but to no avail.

Having lost faith in the Roman Catholic church to protect his wife and children from the scourge of unemployment, he blurts out at a Sunday mass, "Those who profit from Christianity are Jew-boys!"

The object of his hatred is focused on the Samuels, the proprietors of the shipyard that renders him and many other workers redundant.

At a Blackshirt rally he attends, a speaker claims that "Jewish bosses" are deliberately driving down the cost of labour. As in times past, Jews are the ultimate scapegoats.

By chance, his demure daughter, Teresa (Megan Burns), finds work as a maid at the Samuels' sumptuous home, one more reason for him to lash out at Jews.

His animosities are also fueled by the Jewish landlord who harasses his surly wife (Claire Hackett) for rent and by the Jewish pawnbroker who buys the family's trinkets.

Although his descent into fascism is one of its most powerful features, the film also draws strongly on his eight-year-old son for resonance. Indeed, a good part of Liam unfolds through his unguileful eyes.

Liam (Anthony Borrows), his oatmeal face the very picture of innocence, is a boy whose stutter is a source of frustration.

Mrs. Abernathy (Anne Reid), his strict, overbearing parochial school teacher, suggests that he can overcome his affliction if he casts off his sins and cleanses his soul.

An oversimplification, of course. But in the Sullivans' constricted world, the church is their anchor and ultimate salvation.

As depicted by Frears, the church is a distant, superstitious institution that feeds on the fears and traditions of its congregants.

Liam, a small film about a divided family in crisis, leaves an indelible impression. Melding drama with the nasty politics of hate, it churns with deceptive power and poignancy.

STRUMA SURVIVOR TO ATTEND GALA SCREENING OF NEW FILM

With his new film The Struma, writer-director Simcha Jacobovici tells the story of 779 Jewish refugees who fled Romania in 1941 aboard a dilapidated vessel called the Struma. Bound for Palestine, the overcrowded ship limped into Istanbul and later sank while drifting aimlessly in the Black Sea. Nearly 800 people lost their lives in the mysterious tragedy.

The Struma's sole surviving passenger, David Stoliar, is planning to attend a screening of the film this month in Toronto. Also expected in town is Greg Buxton, a diver whose grandparents went down with the ship.

The gala screening is scheduled for Nov. 13 at the Princess of Wales Theatre, 300 King St. W. Tickets are $54; tax-deductible patron tickets are $180. Phone 416-665-8054 or 416-504-6662 for tickets.

Reception 6 p.m., screening 7:30 p.m., patron reception 9:30 p.m. at the CBC's Barbara Frum Atrium.

Culture and the Shoah: The Holocaust, A Cultural Perspective offers a variety of film, theatre, readings, dance and musical events to perpetuate the memory of Holocaust and its victims. This year's theme is Eternal Voices.

Highlights include a reading from The Diary of Anne Frank by Maggie Blake, a dance choreographed by Serge Bennathan, and a dramatized reading by Toronto actor Alon Nashman of a piece by Yiddish writer Chava Rosenfarb.

Also scheduled are readings by Rick Salutin and Steve Paikin, and a new film from director Elida Schogt (Zyklon Portrait). Musicians David Wall and Sasha Luminsky perform with the choirs of the Bloor JCC and Trinity-St.Paul's United Church.

Part of Holocaust Education Week, this fifth annual program is presented by the Cultural Arts Group at the Nadal JCC, with the committee for Yiddish of UJA Federation and the Friends of Yiddish.

Trinity-St. Paul's United Church, 427 Bloor St. W. Members free, non-members $10. Thursday, Nov. 2, 7:30 p.m. 416-924-6211.

Jewish Film Society: Kurt Gerron's Karussell, a 1999 German-Dutch feature film, focuses on Kurt Gerron, the German actor-director who died in Auschwitz, but not before making The Fuhrer Gives a City to the Jews, the infamous propaganda film about Theresienstadt.

The Toronto Jewish Film Society screens both films, Nov. 4 at 5:15 and 7:45 p.m. Art Gallery of Ontario, Jackman Hall. Single tickets, $8, go on sale 15 minutes before each screening. Bill Emery, 416-924-6211.

A Simchah for Simcha: The Friends of Yiddish (FOY) and other groups join together to host an evening of tribute to Toronto poet Simcha Simchovich, in honour of his 80th birthday and his 60 years of literary endeavours.

The program includes a lecture by Yiddish scholar Eugene Orenstein of McGill University, and readings by David Newman and Ellie Moidel from Simchovich's The Song That Never Died, which features translations of works by Yiddish poet Mordecai Gebirtig.

Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St. Free for FOY members; $3 for guests; refreshments. Sunday, Nov. 4, 1:30 p.m.

* * *

Ani Maamin: This "lost and found again" song, which features text by Elie Wiesel and music by Darius Milhaud, tells the story of patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob confronting God and reflecting on their own experiences in the wake of the Holocaust.

Translated as I Believe, the title refers to Maimonides' famous 13 Principles of Faith, which stood as an anthem for doomed concentration camp inmates.

Judy Kopelow, the producer-director, is a nurse in the critical care unit of the Hospital for Sick Children. Musical direction by Fabio Mastrangelo and Sabatino Vacca.

Ettore Mazzoleni Concert Hall, Royal Conservatory of Music, 273 Bloor St. W. Reception sponsored by Windsor Arms Hotel. $18. Nov. 4, 8 p.m.

Survivors' emotions run high in documentaries

The visit brings back painful memories Grossman was previously unwilling to share until now. In 1943, Edwin and his sister met briefly with their parents, but since times were still dangerous, they went back to their foster parents for the duration of the German occupation.

On May 8, 1945, they were reunited with their parents yet again, this time for good. After the war, they emigrated to Canada.

In Rendezvous, produced by Dominique Darmon, Grossman appears relaxed as he reminisces about his boyhood in La Varenne, and one of his daughters wonders how he could possibly have survived.

Beyond everything else, the trip connects Grossman with his daughters on a much deeper emotional level.

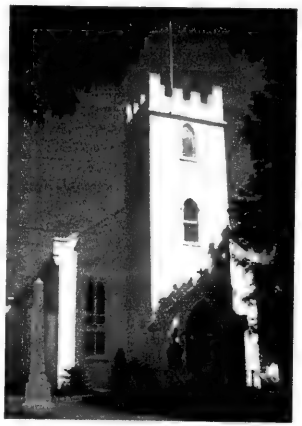
QUICK GETAWAYS AWAIT WITHIN SOUTHERN ONTARIO

As many residents have long appreciated, Southern Ontario is a choice region for tourism, with an abundance of great destinations worth visiting any time of year. Here are a few suggestions:

Joseph Brant House: Within sight of the Burlington Skyway and the foundry smokestacks in Hamilton harbour is a pretty white clapboard cottage in the Georgian style. Known as the Joseph Brant House, it's a replica of an earlier house on the same spot in which the historic Indian chief lived and died.

Brant (1742-1807), a historic native chief, was given a large tract of land for his loyalty to the British Crown. Journeying to the promised land, he and his people crossed the Grand River at a spot that became known as Brant's Ford, later Brantford. His two-storey house is now a museum containing thousands of historic objects.



Stylish architecture in Port Hope.

Brant lies buried in the cemetery of Her Majesty's Chapel of The Mohawks, on Mohawk Street near the Grand River. The cemetery also contains a memorial to native poet Pauline Johnson.

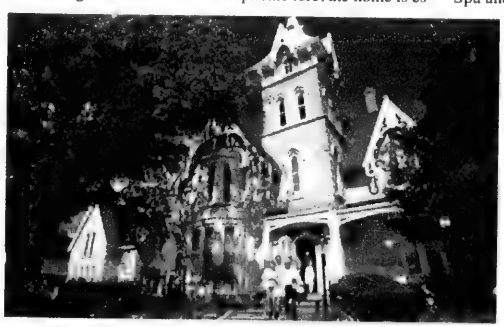
Bell Homestead: A few kilometres south of Brantford is the former home of Alexander Graham Bell. In this simple Victorian farmhouse, now a museum, Bell invented the telephone in July 1874. Two years later, in Brantford, he first succeeded in transmitting speech over telegraph lines and in placing the world's first long-distance call – to Paris, Ont., eight kilometres away.

Although it contains much telephonic lore, the home is essentially a loyal re-creation of the domestic setting in which Bell worked.



The Elmhurst Inn in Ingersoll, Ont., a town of 10,000.

The adjacent Henderson Home, trucked from downtown Brantford in 1969, was Canada's first telephone business office.

Town of Ingersoll: This town of 10,000 boasts an automotive plant, limestone quarries, a curling rink, a volunteer fire department, a legion hall, a library and a rainbow of church groups and service clubs. Local history is recalled in the Ingersoll Cheese Factory Museum, part of a complex of heritage buildings that includes a Blacksmith Shop, Farm Museum, Community Museum and Hockey Hall of Fame.

Various displays in the Community Museum recapture the flavour of life of a bygone era. Numerous items pertain to Major Thomas Ingersoll, the former American whose daughter, Laura Secord, heroically warned the British of a pending attack by American soldiers during the War of 1812.

James Harris, a 19th-century dairy farmer, won fame by exhibiting a huge wheel of Ontario cheese at world's fairs in the United States and England. Today, his Victorian Gothic mansion lies at the centre of Ingersoll's well-known hotel, the Elm Hurst Inn.

King Street once formed part of the main stagecoach route between Hamilton and London. The building with covered porches at King and Hall streets was once an inn that serviced the stagecoaches.

Port Hope: An hour's drive east of Toronto, this attractive lakefront town has much to offer travellers who stray from Highway 401. With a picturesque main street known for its antique shops, the town of roughly 12,000 is a mecca for antique shoppers. It also boasts many century homes and heritage sites, including the 19th-century church where Governor-General Vincent Massey was buried.

A hilly town with extensive ravines, Port Hope incorporated in 1834 and experienced an era of grandeur and promise through the 1870s. Attracted by the cool summer climate, many wealthy Americans built impressive summer homes here. The town was regularly serviced by ferries across the lake from Rochester, N.Y., and other port cities.

Today Port Hope is filled with many architectural remembrances of its storied past. Its main street, Walton Street, is a well-preserved Victorian boulevard, and its residential side streets present a sleepy and old-fashioned vision of civic orderliness. Historic inns include the large Hillcrest Bed and Breakfast & Spa and the small Butternut Inn.

Presqu'ile Provincial Park: Situated about 1½ hours east of Toronto on Lake Ontario, Presqu'ile is one of several provincial parks in Ontario of primary importance to migratory birds. About 125 species of bird nest here, and hundreds more pass through en route to other continents and climes. Each September, Presqu'ile is also a gathering point for monarch butterflies as they begin their annual migration to Mexico.

Presqu'ile is a boomerang-shaped spit of sand and limestone that juts into the lake. It is a great place for close encounters with nature. From spring to fall, it's a birdwatcher's paradise. In winter, it's open for daytime visitors, who routinely spot deer and other animals.

SHABBOS SPICE

This story is adapted from Gemara Shabbos 119a.

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus was emperor of the vast Roman Empire from 161 to 180 CE. Even though the emperor wasn't Jewish, he had many Jewish friends. The Jewish people enjoyed peace and religious freedom during his reign.

Emperor Marcus Aurelius sat in Rabbi Joshua ben Chanania's simple dining room, smiling as he helped himself to another piece of home-baked challah. The room glowed with the warmth of Shabbos (the Sabbath). A fragrant aroma wafted in from the kitchen. Mrs. ben Chanania brought in an earthenware bowl filled with steaming cholent, and placed it on the homespun linen tablecloth. The emperor dug his wooden spoon into the thick, rich stew, and took a lusty bite.

"Joshua, this simple fare is the best food I've had in years! Mrs. ben Chanania, what did you put in this?"

"Nothing much. Just meat, barley, beans, onions, and spices."

"Amazing! Please give the recipe to my head chef."

* * * * * *

Trumpet blasts heralded the arrival of Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus into the royal banquet hall. He slowly made his way through the vast hall, between tables of Senators and noblemen assembled for the royal banquet, and sat down at the head table in his velvet throne. A servant clad in the finest livery deftly set a silver stew pot on the richly embroidered tablecloth. With a flourish, another servant removed the engraved lid, revealing the bean stew. The emperor smiled, anticipating another feast. A third servant dipped a golden ladle into the pot and withdrew a steaming ladleful of the royal cholent. A fourth servant extended a bowl of the finest porcelain to accept the emperor's repast. The gathered senators squirmed in their seats, their faces solemn masks, terrified of possibly offending the Emperor.

Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus dug his diamond-encrusted spoon into the thick, rich stew, and took a lusty bite.

"Guards!" he gasped, as meat and beans splattered all over the beautifully embroidered tablecloth. "The chef is trying to poison me!"

The chef was dragged in, pale and sputtering. "Your Excellency, I merely prepared everything exactly as the rabbi's wife directed."

"Bring in Rabbi Joshua immediately!" commanded the Emperor.

They did.

"Why doesn't this stew taste like it did at your house? The chef claims he followed your wife's directions exactly. So what aren't you telling me?"

"Well, there was one ingredient we neglected to mention, as there is no way the Emperor could obtain it."

"What? How dare you! I can get anything I want! What is this ingredient?"

"Shabbos."

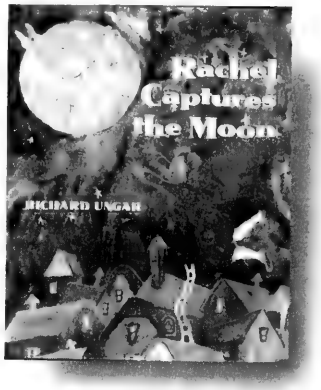
Ungar not only wrote the story, but drew the pictures, too

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

There are a lot of stories about the Jews of Chelm. They were very pious and very good people, but were very silly as well.

Richard Ungar has written a book about Chelm that you will really enjoy. It is called Rachel Captures the Moon, and it was published by Tundra Books earlier this year. It is adapted from a story by Samuel Tenenbaum.



The people of Chelm loved the moon. "In the evening, everyone would gather in the village square and wait for the moon to appear. When it finally did, they would gaze for hours at the magnificent moon as it bathed the entire village in wondrous light."

The problem was that while the moon came up every night, by morning it would disappear. Now, you probably realize that that is exactly what is supposed to happen, and that while the moon goes away, the sun comes up, but as I said, the Chelmites were silly people.

They decided that the only thing to do was to capture the moon, so that it would always be with them. Of course, they didn't know exactly how to do it.

Simon the Carpenter built a ladder that was so high that he was sure he could climb up it and reach the moon. Selma the Cook thought that she could tempt it to come down with the aroma of her famous noodle soup. Rafael the Musician played his violin so beautifully that he was sure the moon would come to hear it. Sarah the Weaver wove a blanket that was so warm and colourful that the moon would want to be wrapped in it. And Aaron the Fisherman tried to catch it with his fisherman's net.

Well, you won't be surprised to hear that nothing worked. The people became very sad and bad-tempered.

Finally, Rachel, the carpenter's daughter, had an idea. She carried a large rain barrel to the town square. When the moon began to rise, everyone ran to the rain barrel – and saw the moon in the water. They were thrilled.

They were especially thrilled when they realized that "the moon that Rachel had captured was even more magnificent than the one that filled the sky the following evening."

Ungar not only wrote the story, but drew the pictures, too. And they are wonderful: full of rich blues, greens, oranges, hot pinks, purples and reds.

This is a very funny book, and it is well worth reading.

Business Profile

Father and son built a thriving company

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The lighting fixtures illuminating your local pharmacy or favourite neighbourhood restaurant were probably manufactured by a Toronto company founded by a resourceful Holocaust survivor from Poland.

Visioneering Corporation, Canada's largest independent lighting manufacturer, produces a full line of fixtures for the commercial and industrial markets.

The Toronto-based firm, the brainchild of Daniel Wiener, sold well over a million fluorescent and HID (high-intensity discharge) fixtures last year.

Wiener, who died last April, established the firm in 1952, a year after his arrival in Canada.

By dint of vision, enterprise and long hours, he transformed it into a formidable force. Visioneering employs some 200 workers in a 270,000-square-foot plant and head office in Weston off Highway 401.

"He was a great but modest person," said his son, Bill, who succeeded his father as president after his death. "He was a man of few words, but always seemed to have the right answer for any problem."

Wiener, who joined Visioneering in 1976 while he was still a student at the University of Toronto, has no special plans to unveil a new line of fixtures to mark the company's 50th anniversary in 2002.

"We're introducing new products all the time," he said.

Citing two examples, he referred to two different types of fixtures. The first uses half as much energy but gives off as much light. The second is tailor-made for bio-hazard environments.

At one time, Visioneering also produced a diverse range of electronic goods: hi-fi components, photo-electric controls and microfurnace ceramic heaters and fans.

But in the 1980s, the Wieners decided to focus exclusively on fluorescent and HID fixtures.

Visioneering, which designs, engineers and manufactures all its products, is virtually the last remaining independent maker of lighting fixtures in this country.

"Most of our competitors sold out to public corporations," said Wiener. "There's only one competitor left."

Fifty percent of its products are exported, mainly to the United States, but also to Mexico, the Caribbean, the former Soviet Union, Western Europe and the Middle East.

Visioneering has a buy-in-Canada policy, but when necessary, it purchases raw materials abroad, including electronic devices and plastic sheeting from Israeli suppliers.

Bill Wiener. His father, Daniel, is pictured [inset] two years before his death.

Wiener's father, a Zionist and one of the founders of the Canadian Technion Society, worked until almost his dying day.

"He was active until last January," said Wiener, who started working for his father during summer breaks from school.

"He said he wasn't feeling well, and went home early. He never returned."

By all accounts, Daniel Wiener, born in Kielce in 1916, lived an extraordinary life.

His mother died in childbirth and his father abandoned him, whereupon he was taken in by a Roman Catholic orphanage.

"He was brought up to be an anti-Semite until his maternal grandfather kidnapped him when he was five years old and taught him his religion," said Julia Rowan, his granddaughter.

In the 1930s, he studied engineering in Warsaw and then worked for a British firm in Radom. During the Holocaust, his first wife and children were killed.

Shipped to Auschwitz in 1944, he ended up in the Mauthausen concentration camp toward war's end.

A steely survivor, he remarried, and began working for the Haganah, smuggling people and ammunition to Palestine.

Had it not been for the illness of his daughter, he would have settled in the newly-created State of Israel.

Like thousands of East European Jewish survivors washed up by the Holocaust, Wiener stayed on in Germany, running a textile shop in Frankfurt.

In 1951, he and his family arrived in Halifax, without money or knowledge of English. "My father's goal in Canada was to ensure none of his children or grandchildren would ever have to share the fears, dangers or insecurity that he had to face in Europe, both as a person and as a Jew."

Within a year, he opened Wiener Electric, the little company that grew into Visioneering.

When Bill Wiener came on board 25 years ago, Visioneering was about one-quarter the size it is today.

It was not the best of times.

His father had just been rushed to Mount Sinai Hospital's intensive care facility, suffering from a mysterious ailment, and now the future of the company was suddenly thrust into Bill Wiener's untested hands.

"The next day, I went to the factory, without an idea about the business," he recalled in mock panic.

"It was tremendously challenging. All kinds of scam artists came out of the woodwork, demanding money my father had allegedly promised. And there was no formal documentation system. Everything was in my father's head."

Fortunately, Wiener managed to get in a few words with him about which employees could be trusted and relied upon.

"When my father returned, after two months, I felt it was important to help him. I was sucked in, although I wanted to continue my studies. Within a year, I knew I couldn't leave."

Although they were of different generations, they meshed seamlessly. "We got along well, despite our different management styles."

In his last remaining years, Daniel Wiener basically looked after the office and the sales force. "He was an advisor to many of our employees, some of whom are third-generation. He always had time for everyone. He wasn't afraid of any challenge. He really enjoyed coming here. It kept him alive."

In 1988, the Wieners, along with a group of fellow survivors, visited Poland to commemorate the anniversary of the liquidation of the Kielce ghetto. "Someone told us this trip became the forerunner of the March of the Living."

In August 2000, he began dictating his memoirs. At his funeral, 500 copies of Daniel's Story were handed out. Yet this is not his sole testament. The company that he built from scratch may well be his lasting monument.

Zelikovitz inducted into Ottawa Sports Hall of Fame

By IAN SADINSKY
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — Local Jewish sports legend Joe Zelikovitz has been inducted into the Ottawa Sports Hall of Fame. Zelikovitz, who died in 1998, excelled in football, basketball, track and field, rugby, softball and handball. He was one of the original members of the Ottawa Jewish Sports Hall of Fame.

"I'm on cloud nine," says his wife Inez. "I feel both happy and sad. Happy that Joe's going into the Ottawa Sports Hall of Fame, but sad that he's not here to experience all the honour that goes with it."

From 1934 to 1938, Zelikovitz was a member of the Ottawa Rough Riders, playing "flying wing" (halfback) on offence and linebacker on defence. His determination and speed earned him the nickname, the "Flying Hebrew."

Zelikovitz was an acknowledged ball hawk, and in one memorable game against the Hamilton Tiger-Cats on Oct. 15, 1938, he intercepted seven passes. Canadian Football League records date back only to the 1950s, so Zelikovitz's feat is not on the books. But to this day, no player has intercepted more than five passes in a single game. His record is all the more amazing since he was a "60-minute" player – playing both offence and defence for the entire game.

"Joe is the first Jew to be elected to the Ottawa Sports Hall of Fame," said Inez, "and on the first try."

In the 1930s, racism in sports was overt. A member of a minority group playing professional sports needed not only exceptional physical skills, but also mental toughness.

"When players would tackle Joe, they often made anti-Semitic comments," said Inez. "But that just made Joe go even harder."

Zelikovitz's Hebrew name, Yehuda Leib, roughly translates as Joe Louis, another fierce competitor who silenced his opponents with his dazzling skills and unshakable determination.

Away from football, Joe was a natural at virtually every sport he played. In 1932, he set a high school one-game scoring record in basketball with 35 points and went on from Lisgar to star for St. Patrick's College in both football and basketball. He even had an invitation to attend Notre Dame. He also was a high scorer in the Senior City Basketball League where he played for the YMHA and Underwood. He was a member of the 1936 inter-provincial rugby football champions, and excelled at throwing the shot put and discus. His strength and speed made him an outstanding hitter and outfielder in the Jewish Men's Softball League.

Zelikovitz suffered a concussion in a CFL game, but returned to the gridiron after shaking out the cobwebs. However, the team doctor warned him that another concussion could be dangerous. Despite requests from Rough Rider officials to continue as a player, Joe hung up his cleats.

Zelikovitz devoted the rest of his life to his three passions – Inez, the family leather business and his synagogue.

"I always told Joe that the shul was his first love – like a mother loves her newborn baby," said Inez. "Joe would come home from the road every Friday to make sure he was up on the bimah as parnass for Shabbat. Joe would walk to and from Beth Shalom regardless of the weather."

Zelikovitz came from a strong Orthodox Jewish background – one of his grandfathers was a Hebrew teacher, the other a parnass of Agudath Achim Congregation (Rideau Street Shul).

In addition to his tireless service to his synagogue, Joe was active in the Ottawa Free Loan Society and the Chevra Mishnayot. The Joseph and Inez Zelikovitz Long-Term Care Centre on the Broadview Campus is an outstanding example of the family's generosity and commitment to the local community.

Recently, Inez established the Joseph Zelikovitz Sports Scholarship Fund that will enable less fortunate youth to participate in sports activities.

As Ottawans contemplate the return of professional football, it seems fitting that the Ottawa Sports Hall of Fame will be honouring Joe Zelikovitz, a unique athlete, gentleman and Jew.

Ian Sadinsky is a writer and consultant whose column Sadinsky in Right appeared in the Ottawa Jewish Bulletin and Review for many years. As a kid, he was a neighbour of the Zelikovitzes and had many bruises from trying to catch Joe's 50- and 60-yard punts and passes.

Israel's World Cup hopes dashed

By CJN NEWS SERVICES

RAMAT GAN — Austria battled back from a one-goal deficit and scored late in the game to eliminate Israel from contention for next year's World Cup in Japan and Korea.

Israel needed to beat the Austrians on Saturday night in order to leapfrog them into second place in European qualifying Group 7 and clinch a playoff berth against Turkey. Instead, Israel allowed a goal on a free kick by Andreas Herzog and the match ended in a 1-1 draw.

Shimon Gershon had given the home team the lead with a penalty in the 56th minute.

The Austrians managed to get the result they needed despite fielding a team missing as many as 14 first-line players, most of whom refused to travel to Israel for security reasons.

"I was not surprised by the Austrians. I was fully aware they would come with a strong, physical team," said Israel's Danish coach Richard Nielsen. "They are hard tacklers and they are tough and their organization was as we expected it would be."

Nielsen said he thought the Israeli team would now look toward replacing some players near the end of their careers.

The coach pinpointed another shortcomings in the Israeli soccer program.

Israel has been without a natural striker for some time and the domestic league would have to develop a top scorer.

What's more, he continued, "there is a huge gap between the league and international competition. We will first have to try to ensure that more teams play in European competitions, so that they can improve."

Nielsen refused to be drawn into commenting on the behaviour of the Austrians in the lead-up to the game, with the visitors trying various ploys to get the match moved to another venue.

Citing security concerns, the Austrian Football Association had asked for the match to be moved to a neutral site. While the match was postponed for almost three weeks, FIFA refused to change the venue. The Austrians then said the hotel food on Shabbat would not be hot and that radio interference would make it unsafe for aircraft to land at Ben-Gurion International Airport.

Ode to a rebbitzin

One of the major differences between a rabbi and a rebbitzen is that a rabbi is ordained following a career choice, whereas a rebbitzen chooses her position based on the man she decides to marry. One could say her ordination is determined by love.

My mom is one of those women.

In 1953, Gitel Flicht (my mother) married Rabbi Phyvle Rosensweig and the two travelled to Kitchener, accompanied only by the optimism of their youth. For the next 37 years, Gitel Rosensweig was the "first lady" of the Jewish community of Kitchener, a mother of five, a teacher, a public speaker, a poet, a volunteer for countless organizations. Because she was married to a rabbi, the next four decades of her life had been determined.

As a young, vivacious girl, Gitel had been an honour student at Harbord Collegiate, and a wonderful daughter and sister. She would bring her hard- earned money from part-time work into her parent's home on Oxford Street – a post-Depression household.

The Flichts sacrificed for their kin. Moshe Flicht, her father, was a slipper maker for 40 years and a chazzan with a shaina shtimeh – a beautiful voice. Hinde, Gitel's mother, was a simple enduring woman who cooked and cleaned for what seemed like everyone.

In 1954, Gitel, a hearty, diminutive woman, gave birth to Etti. By 1960 Gitel had completed her family of five children; I was the youngest, and the only boy.

Gitel was a fine rebbitzen. When an early morning phone call from distraught community members would wake up the household, she was there next to her man, helping him in his painstaking work, often visiting the forlorn shulgoers – reassuring them, consoling them.

One day, my father arrived home with a Satan's Choice Jewish biker-girl in need of a comforting home. With fervour, the young couple pronounced, "Linda is now with us." For two years, Linda lived through us. Gitel was a rebbitzen and she was repairing the world.

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

One of the most inspiring moments I have ever witnessed happened two days after my father died at 61. My mother, two of my sisters and I flew to Israel to bury him in the stunning Jerusalem hills. She loved him so much and her soul was tattered.

As we moved up the El Al aisle to disembark from the plane, Gitel noticed an elderly women hobbling in front of her, every step distinct and slowed by great physical pain.

With grace and colossal compassion evident in her sparkling brown eyes, Gitel took the elderly woman's arm and steadfastly led her down the stairs, arm in arm – a fresh widow and an old lady who would never know the excruciating ache in her guide's heart – a natural act of a natural rebbitzen. An hour later, we buried the love of her youth.

Today Gitel Flicht/Rosensweig/ Weinberger is a beautiful warrior of love for her family and in love once again. Her eyes have not dimmed and her passion for life has not faded. My mother is no longer the rebbitzen of the Kitchener Jewish community, but she is still a rebbitzen – a job that required no resumé, no ordination, but one she grew into and lived up to magnificently.

She is the sole owner of her deeds, actions that have saved the lives of many, sweetened the souls of thousands, and repaired our world as only a rebbitzen can.

I love her, and generations of others do as well.

Peace in Israel. Peace in the world.

I have you fast in my fortress, and will not let you depart. But put you into the dungeon in the round-tower of my heart. – Children's Hour by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My husband Henry is a very kind-hearted man... a little too kind-hearted. He seems to be at everyone's beck and call. When one of his friends needs something, they call on Henry and he is there in a second.

Don't get me wrong, I think this is a wonderful trait and it is probably one of the reasons I married him.

Here is the problem. He puts everyone else's needs above those of his own family. When I need him to come home to have dinner with me and the kids, many times he doesn't make it because he just has to make that illusive "one stop" on his way home and then the kids are lucky if they see him before bedtime.

I can't understand where his head is at. I've talked about it numerous times but to no avail. Any suggestions?

Priority Plagued

Dear Priority Plagued,

Your husband sounds like a dear, sweet man, but I understand how you feel he might have his priorities confused. Although it is very refreshing to find an individual these days who is willing to drop everything to help his friends, he seems to be upsetting you at that expense.

Prioritizing for both of you would help. This would encompass compromise as well. Henry needs to be made more aware of your needs and what you feel is important to both you and your family. It seems he has lost touch with that. However, you also need to be flexible when it comes to his good nature – after all, it is part of his personality and as you said, one of the reasons you married him. Don't try to change or discourage this special trait of his.

Henry doesn't see you as needing him. I guess it is somewhat of a desensitization where you are concerned. He is used to you and the kids managing fine, and doesn't realize his importance in this family role.

Take the time to enlighten him. Explain why it is so important he be there, but don't be unreasonable when at times he is needed elsewhere.

Nobel Prize legitimizes UN 'festival of hate': Cotler

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The selection of the United Nations and its secretary general for the Nobel Peace Prize has legitimized the "festival of hate" against Israel and Jews at the recent UN anti-racism conference, says Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler.

With the UN enjoying this prestigious endorsement, Jews and Israelis can no longer be dismissive of the organization, Cotler said at a recent meeting for Combined Jewish Appeal volunteers.

The UN's heightened status also means the declarations drawn up at the end of the World Conference Against Racism (WCAR), held in Durban, South Africa, will be used by Israel's detractors to claim more credibility, he said.

Cotler, who was a member of the Canadian governmental delegation to the WCAR, appeared shaken by what he described as a pervasive anti-Semitism at the conference.

Irwin Cotler

"I never personally witnessed such visceral hate as I did in Durban," he said. "We are witnessing a new anti-Jewishness... a denial of the national particularity of Jews and of their right to live as equal members of the family of nations."

'The world changed on Sept. 11'

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Holocaust survivor, world-renowned author and Nobel Peace Prize winner Elie Wiesel recently spoke to The CJN about the events that have occurred since the devastating attacks of Sept. 11.

Canadian Jewish News: An entire world collapsed on Sept. 11 along with the two towers of the World Trade Center. Isn't this horrifying tragedy the prelude to a new era of great menace?

Exclusive interview with Elie Wiesel

Elie Wiesel: The world changed on Sept. 11. But what has changed the most is people's attitudes toward the future and toward the dangers that will prevail in that future. The black day of Sept. 11 was a grim test not only for America, but also for all human beings who love justice and peace. That day we became aware that the unthinkable can happen.

Elie Wiesel

I would never have imagined that such a massacre could one day occur.

CJN: Reality certainly surpassed fiction.

EW: For years, I was haunted by the fear that an enormous act of terror might be perpetrated by hairbrained fanatics filled

Jewish Councillors

EDMONTON — Two members of Edmonton's Jewish community won election as city councillors in the city's municipal vote Oct. 15. Both were elected in the west end, where most of the city's 5,000-member community lives. Karen Leibovici, 49, a former Liberal member of the legislative assembly, won with over 17,000 votes. Leibovici moved to Edmonton from Montreal in 1980. Stephen Mandel, 56, a past president of the Jewish Federation of Edmonton and UJA campaign chair, won the second seat by just 33 votes. He is originally from Windsor and has lived in Edmonton for 31 years.

Rabbi Installed

VICTORIA — Rabbi Harry Brechner has been installed as the new rabbi at Victoria's Temple Emanu-El, a Conservative synagogue. Rabbi Brechner came to the city from New Orleans, where he served as an administrator of three Jewish schools. A graduate of the University of Judaism and the Jewish Theological Seminary, he also served as a combat medic in the Israel Defence Force.

New Scholarships

TORONTO — Tel Aviv University and the Dan David Foundation are offering international research scholarships of $15,000 (US) to graduate students or young faculty members (up to six or eight years after approval of their dissertations). Areas being funded this year include a wide variety of humanities and social sciences, as well as life sciences, high-tech, and mathematics. Due date for nominations is Dec. 31. For details, call Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University at 416-787-9930, 514-344-3417, e-mail ddprize@post.tau.ac.il, or go to www.dandavidprize.org.

ISRAEL

Compensation Pledged

JERUSALEM — Ukraine has promised to compensate the families of Israelis killed in a plane crash. Ukraine's president, Leonid Kuchma, made the promise during a telephone conversation last week with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. The pledge came after a Sibir Airlines flight was accidentally shot down Oct. 4 by a Ukrainian anti-aircraft missile over the Black Sea. The flight was on its way from Israel to the Siberian city of Novosibirsk when it crashed, killing all 78 people aboard, 66 of whom were Jews.

New Bus Route

JERUSALEM — Israel's public bus co-operative has agreed to inaugurate a route between Jerusalem and B'nei Brak with a bus service that segregates men and women. Men and women will sit apart on the buses and stand separately at bus stops; men will use the front door while women will use the rear one. The secular Shinui party denounced the proposal as "apartheid."

Croatian President

JERUSALEM — Croatian President Stjepan Mesic said his country will continue to prosecute Nazi-era war criminals while also teaching the importance of the Holocaust. Mesic, who addressed the Knesset during his visit to Israel last week, also indicated he would serve as sponsor of a mobile Holocaust exhibit titled Courage to Remember, prepared by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

WORLD

'Holy War' Calls

BERLIN — Extremist Muslim clerics in Germany are calling on followers to fight a "holy war" against the United States. According to a report in the German magazine Focus, calls to fight alongside Afghanistan's Taliban leaders have been made in several German mosques.

School Vandalized

PARIS — Vandals burned down part of a Jewish elementary school in southern France. Two trailers used as classrooms at the Pardes Elementary School in Marseilles were destroyed last Sunday before firefighters brought the flames under control. The vandals left behind spray-painted messages that said, "Death to the Jews" and "Bin Laden will conquer."

Support for Israel

NEW YORK — A new poll shows that almost three-quarters of Americans continue to support Israel and 56 percent have a favourable opinion of the Jewish state. The poll, conducted by McLaughlin & Associates for the Jerusalem Post and the Chicago Sun-Times, also found that 62 percent of respondents view Yasser Arafat unfavourably.

2002 OlympiYeda

NEWTON, Mass. — Students in grades 8 and 9 are invited to enter the 2002 OlympiYeda. The four-stage science competition culminates in a three-week trip to Israel, including a 10-day science camp, which 25 participants from the United States, Canada, England and Australia share with 25 Israeli peers. Four winners will receive scholarships to the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology. Applications and additional information are available from the American Friends of the Israel Natural Museum of Science, telephone: 617-964-5025, fax: 617-964-5027 or e-mail: israelscience@mediaone.net.

Mulroney Supports Israel

TORONTO — At a gala dinner in his honour here last week, former prime minister Brian Mulroney came to Israel's support. Mulroney said that at the United Nations, "while Israel is effectively shunned, other countries with terrible human rights records are serving on the Human Rights Commission, including Libya as vice-chair, and Syria. These are states that sponsor terrorism."

He also took aim at Canada's participation in last summer's UN-sponsored World Conference Against Racism in Durban, which he called "a sham from the beginning, but it quickly degenerated into a despicable forum for anti-Semitism.

"Instead of boycotting this ridiculous conference, Canada sent the largest delegation of any country in attendance, primarily [groups] who delighted in trashing our own country's human rights record, as well as Israel's, in the eyes of the entire world," he said.

There's nothing uniform about school dress codes

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From tight jeans and headbands in one era to baggy pants and spiked hair in another, the debate over proper attire in school never goes out of style.

Special Report

A draft form of a dress policy was recently developed by the Toronto District School Board which claims it will help "provide learning environments that are safe, nurturing, positive and respectful."

Some public schools, such as Sir Sandford Fleming and Downsview Secondary School, have already opted for uniforms. Others are currently setting up committees to formulate new dress codes.

Jewish day schools also cover the clothing spectrum. Schools such as Eitz Chaim and Netivot have adopted uniforms. Other schools include dress-code policies in their student handbooks.

Rabbi Abraham Soffer, education director at Associated Hebrew Day School, noted that their dress code is not new.

"Ten years ago," he said, "uniforms were rejected. Instead, the board decided to implement a guide to what is acceptable for students to wear at school.

"A dress code was developed based on the premise that the school is a house of Torah.

"In order to teach Bible, people have to be properly attired. Otherwise, Jewish learning is prohibited," Rabbi Soffer noted.

"As styles change, we add the details. Every year we discover new modes of improper clothing such as inappropriate logos on T-shirts or streaked hair."

Parents are informed of the dress code. However, everybody has a different value system, Rabbi Soffer said. "When a situation is grey, we make the decision. The board of directors gave us that right because otherwise you can't run a school."

Some experts feel one of the problems with dress codes is that there is too much room for ambiguity.

When implementing new policies, it is important that regulations be clear, said Osgoode Hall law professor, Alan Young.

Students at Netivot HaTorah Day School wearing uniforms which include blue pants for the boys, tunics and kilts for the girls. They can choose between white, blue or yellow button-down shirts. [Anna Morgan photo]

Whether in a formal legal structure or informal school environment, rules should be structured so that you can function easily within them, said Young.

"Regulations need to be understood," he added. Otherwise, students may only realize they've done something wrong after a rule has been broken.

In a vague environment, Young said, the rule becomes only as good as the person

Arafat's transparent claim

From the editor's desk

Two weeks ago on Saturday night, as Israeli and American officials were attempting to negotiate an understanding, a ceasefire of sorts, with Palestinian security chiefs, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat was speaking to the Palestine General Confederation of Trade Unions in Gaza.

With trademark duplicity, Arafat was throwing kerosene onto the raging fires of West Bank violence, even as his lieutenants were exchanging phone messages with American and Israeli envoys about dousing the flames.

The speech was unremarkable in its incitement. It was a repetition of the same bombastic rhetoric spreading lies about Israeli actions and intentions; urging his people – "children, women, men and the elderly" – to take part in the armed struggle.

The key focus of the speech was Jerusalem, placing it again at the very heart of the conflict with Israel. But, ever media-savvy, Arafat also included certain allusions, which, while not new, are increasingly appearing in his prepared texts.

"The Palestine convoy has turned towards the place that Muslims first faced in prayer, and the third holiest city after Mecca and Medina, the place where the Prophet Mohammed held his night journey and the cradle of our Lord Jesus, holy Jerusalem, the capital of the Palestinian state…"

Moments later, Arafat again invokes an image of Christianity: "We will continue, God willing, on this path until a Palestinian child is able to unfurl the Palestinian flag atop the walls of Jerusalem, its mosques and its churches…"

Arafat repeated a variation of this exclamation referring to "the churches of Jerusalem" and then concluded his speech with: "We swear to God. We swear to the homeland and the holy places of Christianity and Islam that we are guarding that we will complete this journey."

These references bear careful monitoring and equally careful understanding.

The context for those specific allusions two weeks ago was twofold: the re-entry of IDF forces into Bethlehem the week before and Arafat's imminent departure for a visit with the Pope.

Arafat's cynical embrace of his "Lord Jesus" and his attendant encompassing of the Arab Christian community jabs a laughable but dangerous finger into the eye of truth. The pain of the blatant falsehood, however, should not be quickly dismissed.

Arafat's deceit staggers truth on a number of levels. As political commentator Daniel Pipes has observed, the Christian community in the Middle East has been steadily disappearing, in so small part because of its treatment at the hands of the Muslim majority.

Yasser Arafat meets with Pope John Paul last week. [RNS Reuters photo]

In addition, the radical Muslim extremists whom Arafat has conscripted, if not cultivated, for his 14-month war against Israel, harbour only slightly less hostility to their Christian neighbours than they do towards their Jewish ones. As ample proof, the vanguard of the Muslim extremists, the Al Qaeda network of Osama bin Laden, openly calls on its followers to vanquish the "Christian and Jewish crusade."

Finally, Arafat's own denial, at Camp David in July 2000, of the existence of the Jewish temples in Jerusalem is, by extension, also a denial of Christian theology. He cannot refute Jewish history in Jerusalem without refuting Christian history at the very same time.

On the subject of this very period of Jewish history, I am pleased to note the appearance of an important new book by the Tunisian-born historian, Claude Cohen-Matlofsky, entitled Les laïcs en Palestine d'Auguste à Hadrien, published in French by Honore Champion in Paris. It is the first prosopographic study of the Jewish people, identifying the Jewish people, in Eretz Yisrael, or Palestine as the Romans called it then, from intrinsic sources.

Cohen-Matlofsky has undertaken an eye-opening, ambitious examination of the lives of more than 700 people who lived in the area during the politically turbulent period from the first century BCE to the Bar Kochba revolt in the 2nd century CE.

Culling information from a variety of sources, including ossuaries and gravestones from the times, Cohen-Matlofsky has assembled a virtual time tunnel through which the residents around Jerusalem 2,000 years ago "travel forward" and speak to us of the lives they lived. In one instance, Cohen-Matlofsky is able to draw a multi-branched, multi-generational family tree of the family of Elazar Goliath of Jericho.

Cohen-Matlofsky carefully reassembles the broken pieces of the past into a colourful picture of a thriving, vigorous Jewish community in Palestine at that time, in which the predominant spoken and written languages were Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek and Latin.

Her work is a powerful, systematically constructed, unambiguous refutation of Arafat's denial of Jewish history in ancient Jerusalem.

Arafat's sudden claim to be Christianity's protector in Jerusalem is as clumsy as it is transparent. It is imperative therefore that we, at least, see through it.

Harris leaving good legacy, Flaherty tells CJC

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Now that Ontario has passed a tax credit for parents of children in private schools, more than 90 percent of Canadians have access to some sort of funding for independent education, says Jim Flaherty, Ontario's minister of finance.

Flaherty, who spoke recently at the recent regional executive meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said that the Atlantic provinces are now the only ones in the country that have not "joined that change."

Four school systems in Ontario – Francophone public, Francophone Catholic, English public and English Catholic – are funded by taxpayers' money, he said, "and it is difficult to tell parents who send their children to cultural schools of other denominations that after they pay their taxes for the public system they are not entitled to a tax refund."

Starting next year, parents with children in private schools will be eligible for a tax credit of up to $700 per child, or 10 percent of the first $7,000 in tuition fees. The credit, to be phased in over five years, will increase 20 percent per year and will eventually be worth up to $3,500 per child annually.

Flaherty, who is also deputy premier, disagreed with critics of the tax credit who say it will lead to a mass exodus from the public school system. "We do not think that will be the case, [but] we will watch the system closely over the next several years."

Flaherty highlighted other achievements under Mike Harris, who announced recently that he is stepping down as Ontario premier and leader of the provincial Tories.

Ontario finance minister Jim Flaherty addresses CJC, Ontario region, meeting.

When Harris first began railing against high taxes in 1990, Flaherty said, "he was a voice crying in the wilderness. Voters did not support us.

"Now, for the first time in Ontario in almost 100 years, we have had three balanced budgets in a row…[and] the province has made the largest payment in its history – $3 billion – on its public debt.

"Harris' legacy is that we have a diversified, resilient economy. That could not be said 10 years ago."

Flaherty, a leading candidate to succeed Harris as Tory leader, said the decisions the premier had to make were "heart-wrenching, but how do you turn a ship around unless you make difficult decisions?"

He said Harris has led the way in popularizing tax cuts in Canada. "It has become accepted that [lowering taxes] and leaving more money in people's pockets is the way to increase economic activity."

And under Harris, Flaherty said, Ontario has become an important trading partner for such U.S. states as Michigan, Pennsylvania and New York. He added that Ontario now exports about 93 percent of its manufactured goods to the United States.

Flaherty also noted that the province plans to invest $3 billion on transit over the next nine years to ensure that Ontario has a solid inter-regional transit system.

With over $2 billion worth of construction taking place across the province on necessary infrastructure, such as hospitals, universities and colleges, Flaherty said, "all of our tax money is being put towards good use. We are growing in a smart way; we are thinking globally."

Also at the meeting, a plaque was unveiled in honour of the Canadian members of Machal – volunteer soldiers who fought during Israel's War of Independence – who died or went missing while in service.

Ralph Shedletsky UJA Federation's new leader

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Alan Sandler, immediate past president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, passed the gavel to Ralph Shedletsky at the organization's annual meeting last week, but the title of president now belongs to top staff person Allan Reitzes (formerly executive director).

Shedletsky, the federation's new top lay leader, will be known as the chair of the board.

Those changes came about as part of a major restructuring that was passed earlier this year. Other changes to the way the federation is governed include the elimination of its 40-member board of governors, which met on an annual basis and had a limited role.

Shedletsky's team includes Leslie Gales (co-chair of the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow steering committee) as vice-chair.

The vice-chair is expected to succeed the chair, said Joey Steiner, chair of the committee set up earlier this year to review the federation's governance. "Typically in the past we have not planned succession very effectively," he told the 500 people at the meeting, held at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

It is hoped the new structure will enable the federation's 41-member board of directors to set "goals and priorities reflecting the needs of our expanding community," said Steiner.

The changes are very complex and detailed, Sandler noted.

Other significant changes over Sandler's 2½-year tenure included the purchase of land at Bathurst Street and Weldrick Avenue in Richmond Hill for a new Jewish community centre, school site and federation offices.

The move was part of the ambitious Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) project, which Sandler called "one of the highlights" of his presidency. The initiative also involves the development or redevelopment of other local Jewish "campuses," including the Lipa Green/Bathurst Jewish Centre complex and, downtown, the Miles S. Nadal JCC (formerly called the Bloor JCC) and the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto.

In an address that focused largely on the qualities of leadership, Beth Tzedec's Senior Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl said that "in a community as large as ours, [being a Jewish leader] means fostering a commitment to diversity."

The rabbi cautioned that, although there is a need to be careful about the spending of communal funds, finances must not be allowed to dictate the direction of Jewish life.

"We must find a way to recruit excellent staff – educators, communal servants, rabbis, chazzanim – to our community, and we are going to have to face the reality that we will have to have to pay more to bring them here, to Canada and to Toronto, unless we are able to grow them here ourselves.

"Our hope," he said, "will come from challenging the many gifted and risk-taking people in our community to rise to a new level of knowledge, of giving and of performance."

The rabbi noted how important the Jewish federation of Chicago was in his own early life, funding his education and ensuring that his family could join a synagogue.

This year's UJA Federation campaign co-chairs, David Koschitzky and Michael Bregman, provided a campaign update, noting that it had just passed the $30 million mark. The average donation increase this year is more than 25 percent, with 70 donors who've entered the "major gifts" category of more than $10,000, and 15 who've upped their pledges to more than $50,000, said Bregman.

Because of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's request for financial assistance to offset $700 million being diverted to security, the original campaign goal of $47 million was increased to $50 million.

The meeting also included presentation of lay leadership awards.

Recipients of the Shem-Tov Award recognizing exemplary lay leadership were: Ralph Berger, JVS of Greater Toronto; Fay Gold, UJA Federation; Stan Kugelmass, Reena; Susan Maldoff, Jewish Family & Child Service; Lionel Robins, Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living; Marvin Sadowski, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care; Steven Silver, Jewish Camp Council of Toronto; and Michael Weinrich, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services.

Alison Himel, a director of UJA Federation, and Judith Finer-Freedman, chair of the Lion of Judah division, received Leadership Development Awards.

Debbie Kimel, chair of the Lion of Judah Endowment, received the Phil Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence, and Ronnie Appleby was given the Ben Sadowski Award, UJA Federation's highest honour.

Shedletsky, an organizational psychologist who chaired last year's community planning and allocations committee, spoke of the federation's role in integrating new immigrants, providing financial assistance to the vulnerable, partnering with community agencies and providing "financial, political and spiritual support" to Israel.

A native of Montreal who moved here 32 years ago, Shedletsky said it is "a testament to this community that it has continued to be a magnet for Jews from all over the world."

An indictment with a number of accused

Last week the IDF announced, bitterly but stoically, that Adi Avitan, Benny Avraham and Omar Souad, the three soldiers abducted last year Oct. 7 from Har Dov at the Lebanese border, must be officially declared dead without their place of burial being known.

The soldiers were kidnapped in the full light of day by a well-planned, well-executed operation of Hezbollah involving diversionary tactics, lightning-quick movement and the deception of UN identities.

For over a year, Israel has tried to retrieve the soldiers. At first, it believed it was negotiating an exchange of prisoners; more recently however, it understood it was negotiating the retrieval of their bodies. Indeed, the decision by the IDF chaplain to conclude the soldiers were no longer alive was reportedly based on new intelligence regarding the original extent of the soldiers' wounds and the nature of the treatment of the soldiers by their Hezbollah captors.

The soldiers' deaths are a searing indictment of the despicable, inhumane brutality of Hezbollah. It is quite apparent now that its negotiations with Israel – through a third party, primarily, though not exclusively, Germany – were nothing more than a cruel ruse. Oblivious of even minimal standards of civility and decency towards its enemies, Hezbollah manipulated the murder of its captives even as it mocked the suffering of the captives' families.

But Hezbollah is only the first, most prominent name on the indictment. Other names appear as well.

Lebanon stands accused for having effectively given carte blanche to Hezbollah. It has surrendered its sovereignty and its will to terrorist thugs and violent fanatics who will never again accede to Lebanese governance or independence. Lebanon is now captive to Hezbollah and its backers, Iran and Syria, no less than Avitan, Avraham and Souad were.

The United Nations is accused as well. A number of questions, all of which taint the UN, still shroud the circumstances of the abduction: the use by the Hezbollah abductors of UN uniforms and a UN vehicle; the filming, from a safe distance of course, of the abduction by UN forces; the inability of those same UN forces to intervene during or even immediately after the abduction; the denial of the existence of the videotape film by UN officials; the initial refusal to release the videotape to Israel, once the existence of the film had become known; and the alteration of the tape by UN officials to protect the identity of the actual kidnappers. Inexplicably, the UN was recently awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. It was the last indignity in this shameful, sordid scenario, like one of the twisted, floating props in a surreal Salvador Dali world.

Tears of grief for the slain soldiers, alas, co-mingle with tears of anger. For the people of Israel and its supporters, it seems ever thus.

Where is the tolerance?

I am a Canadian-born Jew whose grandparents immigrated to this country from Romania and Austria at the end of the 19th century.

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, addressing our nation one week after the unspeakable horror and devastation visited upon the thousands of innocent victims and their families in New York and Washington, D.C., said we are a nation of immigrants, a nation built upon justice and tolerance. Where is this tolerance here and in the United States when bigots and hoodlums harass children and adults who they believe are guilty of the crime of being born Muslim? These racists have come out of the woodwork to further demonstrate their hatred by defiling and even setting fire to mosques in Canada and in the United States, because they believe that all Muslims are responsible for the acts of fanatics who comprise a miniscule segment of the American and Canadian Muslim populations.

I am certain that virtually all Canadians, Jews and non-Jews, who I believe are fair minded, stand with and support our friends and neighbours in the Muslim community in these trying times.

We also stand with the Hindus and Sikhs who have been targeted by racists because they "look like Arabs."

Our country is a mosaic of individuals from every country in the world and our neighbours to the south are a melting pot for such individuals. Our democracies have survived other crises and will certainly survive the present one.

Doing harm to Israel

Re: Keith Landy's article (CJN, Oct. 18). Landy hits the nail smack on the head when he says there is no moral relativism in the battle against international terrorism. However I believe he is making the same mistake as many other well-intended people by saying that the enemy is only Islamic extremism.

Landy is following the propaganda line of U.S. President George W. Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair, which is a process leading to an Arab state for Yasser Arafat, who was an accomplished terrorist long before Osama bin Laden was on the scene. The Palestinian state, the 23rd in the Arab Empire, will be in Israel's heartland — Judea and Samaria. By repeating the propaganda line of Bush and Blair, Landry is doing great harm to Eretz Yisrael and klal Yisrael.

Looking for people

The Simon Wiesenthal Centre is currently working on a project examining the different forms of resistance during World War II and the Holocaust. To this end, we are attempting to locate people who either worked with, or were saved by, Dr. William Perl, a prominent figure in the Resistance movement in Austria during the 1930s.

If you or somebody you know had contact with Perl during this period, please contact me at the Simon Wiesenthal Center in one of the following manners: Telephone: 310-772-2437, e-mail: prosenhaft@ wiesenthal.net, fax: 310-772-7652.

Looking for family

I am looking for any information about my family, which lived in Radom, Poland and was transported, as far as I know, to Treblinka in 1942. The family name was Teitelbaum. The patriarch was Mordechai. A son, Alter, lived one more year in the ghetto before he was shot in 1943. Before that, the family had an oil factory under the name of Palma. I would appreciate any information I could get about them.

UN does not condemn Arab states

Once again, as in 1990-1991, the nations of the western world are facing a real crisis with regard to the Arab and Muslim world. And, once again, we are being told that if only the Palestinian problem could be solved there would be world peace!

Over and over again, we are told that Israel is not fulfilling the United Nations resolutions. For some unknown reason, the world has forgotten UN Resolution No. 181, passed in November 1947, which proposed the setting up of two independent states, a Jewish one and an Arab one. Israel accepted the proposal. The Arab nations, however, absolutely refused to accept the establishment of a Jewish state and therefore rejected the establishment of an independent Arab state as well.

Instead, the day following the establishment of an independent Jewish state, six Arab states invaded it in an attempt to destroy it – an outright violation of the UN charter! For some unknown reason, these Arab states were never condemned for this attack. And to this day, these Arab states are still unwilling to accept an independent Jewish state, continuing to support terrorists who are still trying to destroy it.

Sadly, also to this day, the UN refuses to condemn the Arab states for this breech of the UN charter. The only resolutions that ever get passed are those condemning Israel when it defends itself against this continuous aggression.

Until the UN takes a firm stand and demands that the Arab nations cease supporting and carrying out attacks against Israel, there is little chance of any kind of peace in the Middle East.

Remembrance Day

Yesterday's courage and tomorrow's heroes

On November 11, Canadians will be marking Remembrance Day. Approximately 17,000 Jews served in WWII. This is the story of one of them. Let us try to remember them all.

By BERNIE M. FARBER

On Feb. 3, 1944, Sydney Simon Shulemson was a 29-year-old junior officer with the Royal Canadian Air Force (RCAF) who, like 17,000 other Canadian Jews, enlisted in the Canadian Armed Forces to battle the evil of Nazism.

Sydney Shulemson, circa 1944.

Shulemson remembers Feb. 3 as if it were yesterday. He flew with the Buffalo Beaufighter Squadron whose job it was to engage enemy convoys off the coast of Norway. The Beaufighters were twin-engine, long-range attack fighters with four cannons that carried eight rockets. The Nazis were using flying boats as reconnaissance aircraft, and armed merchant marine ships to carry much-needed war materials to Germany. On that cold overcast day, Shulemson's team, which consisted of about 12 RCAF coastal command aircraft, attacked the enemy convoy, successfully completing its mission.

On his way back to base, Shulemson spotted a Nazi Messerschmitt 109 which had been sent to attack the Allied squadron. The Messerschmitt was a lighter, more durable plane, a small fighter used by the Nazi Luftwaffe for close aerial combat. Beaufighter squadrons flew planes, which, while sturdy, certainly did not have the versatility of the Messerschmitt. Any dogfight between a Beaufighter and a Messerschmitt usually ended with the Beaufighter plunging to earth.

That morning, the Messerschmitt was hot on the tail of one of Shulemson's flying Beaufighter comrades.

Flying Officer Sydney Shulemson was a skilled flyer. On his first operational mission, which took place off the north coast of Scotland in July of 1943, Shulemson destroyed one German Blohm and a Voss flying boat. He already had a reputation as one of the squadron's most respected and gutsy flyers.

Demonstrating the courage that was part and parcel of the RCAF, Shulemson manoeuvred his fighter so that he was able to return a blast of cannon fire near the tail of the Messerschmitt. As Shulemson tells the story, he wanted to "get his attention." The manoeuvre worked. The Messerschmitt peeled away from giving chase and instead trained its sights on Flying Officer Sydney Shulemson.

What followed was a 20-minute dogfight: Shulemson's large, twin-engine fighter against the Nazi Messerschmitt. All of Shulemson's training and expertise was brought to bear on that fateful day. Beaufighter pilots fly their crafts much lower than Messerschmitt pilots. Shulemson undertook what is known in fighter flying as a "half-flick and roll." This dangerous manoeuvre rolls the large fighter 180 degrees into another direction at an altitude of about 75 feet above the water. The Messerschmitt, used to flying at 20,000 feet, was unable to follow Shulemson's heroic aerobatics.

This allowed Shulemson to reach the safety of a rain cloud where he breathed easy thinking that he finally lost his pursuer. But this was not to be. The Messerschmitt turned up again. Shulemson directed his fighter sideways, which protected him from the German fighter's bullets that stitched a pattern through his wing, the spot where his cockpit had been just seconds before.

And still the deadly chase continued, the Messerschmitt following Shulemson through four more complete turns before he flipped out and broke away, this time for good. He had saved his life and the life of his fellow comrades. He piloted his crippled fighter safely back to base.

Upon his return from the mission, Flying Officer Sydney Shulemson was awarded the Distinguished Service Order. Six months later, Shulemson participated in another sortie in which he and his comrades inflicted heavy damage on three enemy destroyers, sinking two heavily defended enemy vessels in the Bay of Biscay. For this, and indeed his entire valiant tour of duty, he received the Distinguished Flying Cross and became the highest decorated Canadian Jewish serviceman in World War II.

This Remembrance Day it behooves all of us, especially in light of the tragic events of Sept. 11, to remember those brave soldiers who fought against tyranny and fascism so that our children and our children's children are free to grow and prosper within this great Canadian democracy.

This Remembrance Day, as in all past Remembrance Days, I wear my poppy with pride. I will remember the heroic exploits of Flying Officer Sydney Simon Shulemson and all the other Canadian war heroes who gave so gallantly of themselves for our future freedom. At the same time, I will today cast my mind to the other side of the world where American, British and Canadian soldiers have once again taken up the torch of freedom and democracy to rid the world of the 21st century's blight – terrorist extremism. May God bless them and watch over them.

Bernie Farber is the executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. Sydney Shulemson was a volunteer for the community relations committee of the Canadian Jewish Congress when he began working there.

The 'martyr' syndrome

The above title headlines an interesting article I found in the Oct. 8 issue of The Jerusalem Report. Written by Isabel Kershner, the one-page essay goes to the very heart of the often puzzling and apparently increasing phenomenon of people sacrificing their lives.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Martyrs, says the author, have varied backgrounds, both psychologically and socially. The most common feature appears to be the religious belief that martyrdom has an eternal reward. In addition, there is the accolade bestowed upon the person who commits suicide on behalf of a larger issue. It is mostly men, usually religious Muslims, who believe that as martyrs they will not really die but live on in an environment that may be called paradise.

Gaza psychiatrist Dr. Eyad Sarraj describes the martyr as one who believes he is opening the door to a new life, something he would never do if he thought that death was really the end of it.

Do such persons have some characteristic in common? According to Sarraj, "these people had a problem with power either in their childhood or later on. This is the ultimate power, controlling life and death."

"Maybe," says Sarraj, "being Muslim and facing the same kind of feelings of being victims in relation to Israeli and American power" led the Sept. 11 attackers "to the maximum exercise of power against the world's only superpower."

Statistics show that Jews rarely adopt this stance. Perhaps the basic teaching of our religion – that life, and not death, is to be our main motivation – has played a role. Whatever the reason, Jews do not seem to be good candidates for choosing death, unless such sacrifice appears to achieve some concrete goal.

Altogether, the subject is complex and no easy explanation is at hand for the causes of martyrdom, nor does a single description cover all those who choose this end. It has, however, become an aspect of our times, and its basic irrationality (as it usually appears to us) makes it difficult to combat it successfully.

After all, one cannot prove to the potentially suicidal person that his or her perception of a glorious afterlife may be erroneous. That argument is likely to fail. A person willing to choose death has already given up on the attractions of life in this world.

Fortunately, for most of us this line of thinking is hard to comprehend and impossible to embrace. But there are many people out there to whom it appeals, and we will rarely have an opportunity to dissuade them from their purpose, even if we could reach them before they take their lives.

If not now, when?

When I first visited Yad Vashem, my initial reaction was that I wanted to go home and make love to my husband, see children playing in the parks, reaffirm that life still mattered. Years later, on Sept. 11, watching the collapse of the World Trade Center towers, knowing that thousands were dying, I could not even imagine what reactions would follow. Months later, I begin to see what is possible.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

First, we honour the dead, those whose lives were so cruelly interrupted. Second, we must make sure that the truth about the murderous attack is clear, and that its delusional perpetrators are identified for what they are: cold-blooded murderers, impervious to the human values all great religions take for granted. As Judith Shulevitz writes (in the New York Times): "If we have learned anything, it is that there are ideas that demand rebuttal." Now is the time for rebuttal.

We must rebut the notion that the terror stalking us will be put to rest by sacrificing Israel. That is a horrible myth which the Islamists would like to foist on the West, especially on America (but Canada, too), in order to isolate Israel and leave her abandoned. When politicians or media stars move in that direction, we must publicly remind them that the plot against the World Trade Center was hatched long ago, when negotiations were proceeding for a settlement between Israel and the Palestinians. In fact, terror exists precisely to prevent such a settlement.

We must proclaim that those behind terror are not the dispossessed and wretched of the earth, but middle class and wealthy Islamists who cannot find their place in a modern world; who resent the successes of western democracy so much that they demonize a civilization both hated and admired.

However, there are millions seething with anger and humiliation. It is they who we need to see and hear honestly. Support for Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, Syria and even Egypt has made us odious in their eyes. They cannot overthrow their own dictators, backed as they are by Western democracies for their own interests. So they turn on those democracies. We must insist that our elected leaders begin to alleviate the conditions which lead to such hatred. This effort is no longer a luxury, but a necessity.

Once the false arguments are rebutted, we are still left asking "What can we do?" I trust in the sentiments of the writer of the Epistle to Timothy (in the Christian Bible): "God has not given us the spirit of fear, but of power and love and a sound mind." We have seen great terror and great misery. We can resist the fear. We also have the power to address conditions that allow evil men to deceive millions.

For a beginning, I have decided that, in our own backyard, there are things we can do. We must require more of our government than status-seeking photo-ops and bland reassurances that all will be well. So I protest the B.C. provincial government's decision to back away from social housing. I write to Hedy Fry (my MP) to express my dismay at her silence when Prof. Sunera Thobani rants, not at terror, but at its victims. Both clearly missed the message that a country sends out when it turns its women into piles of rags. Instead, Thobani trashes countries that, however imperfectly, provide free and open societies.

And we must require more of ourselves, not because we are Jews, but because we are human beings. Last week my family visited the Winnipeg Holocaust Centre, where a pillar is covered with written student reactions to the messages conveyed in that centre. One wrote: "Always hold firmly to the thought that each one of us can do something to bring some portion of misery to an end."

We have enjoyed a half-century of unbelievable prosperity – yet nearly 20 per cent of our people live in poverty. If we can do things to bring that misery to an end – and require our government to seriously attack poverty on a national and international level – we will have helped to remove the anger that allows evil to manipulate millions.

Then some good might yet grow from the rancid dust of Sept.11. If not now, when?

What kind of war is it anyway?

As everyone knows, we are locked into an alleged "war" on terrorism. Yet wars usually have defined combatants; you can identify your allies and enemies. And you can usually tell when a war is over – either you capture something or the enemy surrenders. If this is a war, it will be, as the Israelis know, a war without end.

Bruce Elman in Windsor

Moreover, the instruments of war are crude ones. They cannot be finely adjusted to take into account varying degrees of culpability. The first time terrorists attempted to blow up the World Trade Center, we did not go to war. We took the usual steps associated with the commission of a criminal offence: the perpetrators were apprehended and tried and sentenced to prison. Here we might have tried a "police operation" first. If that was unsuccessful, we could always have resorted to a war later on. The only other "war" we have had recently on this continent was (is?) the "war on drugs," and we all know how well we are doing in winning that one!

According to U.S. President George W. Bush and other western leaders, this war is against the terrorists and against those countries or individuals who support and shelter them.

But this is where the credibility breaks down. Take, for example, the West's (especially the United States') relationship with Saudi Arabia. The United States is dependent on Saudi oil. After Sept. 11, the Saudi-led Organization of Petroleum Exporting Companies assured the Americans that they would keep oil supplies stable. In exchange, the United States has not criticized the Saudis' silence over the American-led offensive against Osama bin Laden and the Al Qaeda terrorist network. Although many of the Sept. 11 hijackers have been identified as Saudis, Saudi Arabia has refused to provide information on the terrorists, will not help track them down and will not allow the Americans to use their bases to strike blows against them.

Nor has the United States done anything about evidence that Saudi citizens help finance bin Laden and Al Qaeda. On Sept. 20, Bush said, "Either you are with us or you are with the terrorists." Apparently, this is not so.

Another example is the recent election of Syria to a seat on the United Nations Security Council. Syria, despite being on the U.S. list of countries that sponsor terrorism, received 160 of 177 votes cast by nations in the General Assembly for the Council's vacant Asian seat.

And what are Syria's credentials for this seat? It harbours 11 terrorist groups, including Hezbollah; some of the terrorist organizations sponsored by Syria have been implicated in the events of Sept. 11; and President Bashar Assad has called on the Arab world not to join the fight against terrorism.

Canada will not disclose how it voted. Last year, the United States led a campaign to keep Sudan, another terrorist state, off the Security Council. This year, the Americans took no measures to block Syria's election. Over the years, Syria has clearly demonstrated that they are "with the terrorists." Would the West be willing to expand the war to Syria when it is unwilling to even take a strong stand against its election to the Security Council? It seems unlikely.

Like many others, I believe that there is a strong link between the atrocities of Sept. 11 and the anti-Semitism at the World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa. If the rhetoric and demonstrations at the conference did not actually encourage the terrorists, they at least provided a psychological atmosphere in which the terrorists felt free to act.

After Sept. 11, Mustafa Tlass, Syria's defence minister, blamed the attacks on the World Trade Center on Israel. At a meeting in Damascus with a delegation from the British Royal College of Defence Studies in attendance, Tlass said that the Mossad had planned the attack as part of a Jewish conspiracy and that advanced warning had been given to thousands of Jewish workers at the twin towers not to go to work that day. As bizarre as this piece of hate propaganda may sound to us, there is evidence that it has taken hold in the Arab world and even beyond. Yet no other western government has taken steps to condemn this atrocious libel.

If, as everyone says, we are in a war, we certainly have an odd way of going about it.

The Kirshner File

The Struma's sole survivor tells his story

David Stoliar is the ultimate survivor. In the winter of 1942, the decrepit refugee ship he was on, the Struma, was torpedoed by a submarine in the Black Sea. The Struma, with 779 Jewish refugees and 10 crewmen aboard, shuddered and exploded in a hail of fragments, sinking rapidly beneath the cold, unforgiving waters.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The force of the blast threw upwards of 100 people overboard, including Stoliar, a 19-year-old Romanian Jew whose father had booked his passage on the ill-fated Struma. Clinging desperately to a piece of wood, he wallowed in the Black Sea, holding on for dear life.

Somehow, Stoliar survived. After 24 hours, he was picked up by a Turkish coast guard vessel.

He was the sole survivor.

On Nov. 13, Stoliar will be here to attend a special screening of The Struma, a film about the incident. Written and directed by local filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici, this compelling documentary, which had its world premiere at the recent Toronto International Film Festival, will be shown at the Princess of Wales Theatre at 7: 30 p.m. (Ticket information is available by calling 416-504-6662, extension 236).

Nearly 60 years after its sinking, the Struma remains crystal clear in Stoliar's mind. Recently, he talked about it in an interview from his home in Bend, Oregon, where he lives with his second wife.

He was born in Kishinev on Oct. 31, 1922. The city was then in Romania but is now the capital of Moldova. His parents, Jacob and Bella Stoliar, were divorced when he was 10.

Conditions for Jews in Romania deteriorated sharply after the outbreak of World War II. In 1940, under pressure from Germany and the Iron Guard, a pro-German, fascist political movement, the government disenfranchised Jews, rescinding their citizenship.

Shortly afterward, Ion Antonescu, a former defence minister, formed a new government with the viciously anti-Semitic Iron Guard. Repercussions followed. Jewish shops and Jewish-owned companies were confiscated, and amid the mounting uncertainty, Jewish homes were looted, synagogues were desecrated and Jews were pressed into labour battalions. Adding to the horror was a particularly gruesome Iron Guard pogrom in Bucharest that consumed the lives of 120 Jews.

On June 29, 1941, the Jews of Jassy were massacred by the German and Romanian armies in conjunction with units of an Einsatzgruppe, a mobile killing squad whose sole task was to murder so-called undesirables. As allied German and Romanian soldiers rolled through Bessarabia, Bukovina and Dorohoi, they killed yet more Jews.

Toward the close of that terrible summer, the Romanians began sending Jewish deportees into German-occupied Transnistria. Tens of thousands perished.

Like all able-bodied young Jewish males, David Stoliar was taken to a forced labour camp. Upon Stoliar's release, his father decided that he should leave the country. "Life as a Jew in Romania had become extremely difficult, dangerous and unbearable," he said.

Before boarding the Struma, which had been built in Britain as a yacht for a wealthy client almost a century earlier, the Jewish passengers were harassed by Romanian customs officials. "They were callous and nasty. They took away most of our possessions and all our money and jewelry. Many passengers were strip-searched."

Stoliar, the only member of his family on the Struma, was accompanied by his fiancée, Ilse Lothringer, and her parents.

"We were not allowed on board prior to embarkation. When we finally boarded, we could not believe that it was a ship. It was rickety and decaying, 61 metres long and six metres wide, and unfit for hauling animals, much less people. It had been refurbished to accommodate 150 passengers."

Stoliar wanted to get off, but could not. "There was no way to back out. The organizers made sure of this."

The Struma set out from the port of Constanza on Dec. 12, 1941. It was bound for Palestine, ruled by Britain under a League of Nations mandate. Stoliar was not a Zionist. "I did not care about politics at that time. Survival was my priority."

Within hours of leaving Constanza, the ship's engine broke down. The captain of a passing tugboat demanded a hefty payment to repair it.

A few days later, the engine failed again. Turkish tugs towed the Struma into Istanbul harbour. There it languished for weeks under quarantine, the passengers forbidden to disembark.

"Conditions on the ship were intolerable. The air inside was stifling and the stench retching. We had to take turns on the deck. No one could bathe. Access to the toilets was very limited.

"Hunger and filth were rampant. There were fights over the meagre food. We had over 30 doctors on board, but no medicine, not even aspirin. It was a slow physical and mental death. The ship was a floating coffin.

"We knew that we would never make it to Palestine. Our only hope was that the Turkish authorities would allow us to disembark in Istanbul."

Turkey permitted the Jewish community to send food and supplies, but drew the line at giving the hapless passengers sanctuary. A neutral power, Turkey was caught in a vise by Germany and Britain.

Turkey had no wish to antagonize Germany by welcoming Jewish refugees. Nor was Turkey willing to risk Britain's opprobrium by letting the Struma steam on to Palestine. Britain, having placated Palestinian Arabs by restricting Jewish immigration, did not want the Jews to reach the shores of Palestine.

David Stoliar

The plight of the Struma was paradigmatic, underlining the virtual abandonment and powerlessness of European Jews during the Holocaust.

As a result of the pressures brought to bear on Turkey, the Struma was towed into the Bosporus and left to drift into the Black Sea without a functioning engine.

On Feb. 24, 1942, less than a month after the infamous Wannsee conference in Berlin, which doomed European Jewry to systematic destruction, a submarine fired a torpedo at the Struma.

In his film, Jacobovici speculates, plausibly, that a Soviet torpedo hit the ship.

"It blew up and shreds were scattered all around," recalled Stoliar. "The explosion thrust me into the air. I found myself in the water with many other people. When I surfaced, the ship was gone.

"We all tried to hold on to debris and keep afloat. By the evening, they had drowned. I was alone. Then I saw the chief mate, Lazar Dikof. He was clutching a fragment of a door. By the next morning, he, too, had died of exposure."

Stoliar was not injured by the explosion, but the frigid water froze his arms and legs.

After being rescued by a Turkish coast guard cutter, Stoliar was taken to the fishing village of Sile. There he rested for two or three days. Then, after a week of treatment at a military hospital, he was incarcerated in a prison.

Six weeks later, with the help of the president of Istanbul's Jewish community, he received an entry certificate from the British consulate. It enabled him to travel by train to Palestine. A friend who lived there helped him. Within months of his arrival, Stoliar joined the British Eighth Army, which was posted to North Africa.

Stoliar's father survived the war in Bucharest. " He managed to keep away from problems."

His mother, caught by the Gestapo in Paris, was murdered in Auschwitz.

Upon being demobilized, Stoliar returned to Palestine with his new Egyptian wife, Adria Nacmias, who died in 1961. During Israel's War of Independence, he fought with the Haganah. After the dust settled, he worked for the Esso Oil Company in Haifa. Ron, his son, was born in Israel.

In 1954, the Stoliars moved to Tokyo. They lived in Japan, where he was a business executive, for almost two decades. Seven years after his wife's death, he married Marda Emslie, an American from Portland, Oregon. In 1972, after residing in Paris and Taipei, they settled in Bend. His wife runs a baking school. He helps her.

Stoliar, who's in fairly good health, has seen an abbreviated version of The Struma, which also delves into the efforts of Greg Buxton – a British diver and grandson of two of the victims – to find the wreck of the ship and affix a memorial plaque on its hull.

"The film," he said, " is very accurate. Its account of the Struma incident is morbidly impressive and very sad."

Ve'ahavta maintains busy agenda

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish humanitarian and relief committee, is preparing to launch a homework club for school-aged members of the Russian community.

The program, modelled on a successful three-year-old homework club in Regent Park, will see Ve'ahavta volunteers assist youngsters from Grade 1 to OAC level.

The homework club will kick off some time in November and be held at the Russian Jewish Community Centre, said Rachel Lasry, program director for Ve'ahavta.

The program "will give kids a positive learning environment and focus on positive results." About 20 to 30 Russian youngsters are expected to participate in the initial phase of the program, she said.

The homework club is part of an ambitious series of programs on Ve'ahavta's fall and winter agenda. Other activities include a return to Guyana in February or March to conduct a medical mission; a field trip to Zimbabwe in October and November to study the transmission of HIV/AIDS from mothers to children; an ongoing Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless; travelling Tikkun Olam (Mend the World) workshops – lunch hour debates in corporate Canada, beginning in November; and the resumption of the Jewish-Somalia Homework and Mentorship Program in Regent Park.

A planned bus trip to New York City to lend support to families of victims of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks has been cancelled. Instead, Ve'ahavta will forward about $4,000 to the American Jewish World Service, its partner organization in the United States, to be allocated to victims of the attack.

Lasry said Ve'ahavta set up a special fund to collect aid for New Yorkers after it received numerous calls from supporters who were looking for an outlet to help those affected by the attack.

Ve'ahavta has experienced a similar outpouring of concern about the Afghan refugee crisis. "We're researching and doing the groundwork and talking to people on the ground there now," Lasry said.

Although no specific plan is in place at the moment, Ve'ahavta may partner with CITY TV (network journalist Peter Silverman is a member of its board) and World Vision to lend assistance to those affected by hostilities in Afghanistan.

"We're still determining whether to send personnel and supplies" or to simply support World Vision's efforts in the Central Asian nation, Lasry said.

For more information, visit Ve'ahavta's Web site at www.veahavta.org or phone 416-964-7698.

Stanley Hartt to head State of Israel Bonds

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel has experienced wars and intifadahs, inflation and recession, yet the beleaguered Middle Eastern country remains an attractive area for international bond investors.

Stanley Hartt is well acquainted with the solid return of Israel Bonds. Although he has not been formally associated with State of Israel Bonds in Canada, for several years he has been providing "spot work" for Bonds, suggesting technical ways of making the product even more attractive to Canadian investors.

Hartt's association with Bonds took a formal turn earlier this week when he was named chairman of the board of State of Israel Bonds Canada, the Canadian arm that markets the securities.

Hartt, a onetime deputy minister of finance and chief of staff to former prime minister Brian Mulroney, takes over from George Cohon, senior chairman of McDonald's Restaurants of Canada, who remains on the board as honorary chairman, with Alex Grossman becoming lifetime chair emeritus.

Other senior national posts include new vice-president Murray Dalfen, and returning terms for Mike Florence, national campaign chair, Eric Slavens, national secretary, and PR chair Hershell Ezrin.

Hartt, who currently serves as chair of the Canadian division of the U.S. banking giant Salomon Smith Barney, says Israel Bonds are a popular fixed-term investment vehicle with business people and institutional investors in Canada. They have a high credit rating and a record of never missing a payment.

According to Moody's Investors Service, Israel's government bonds, in foreign currency denominations, are rated A2, four notches below Canada's Aa1 rating.

In layman's terms, that means professional bond-raters consider State of Israel Bonds a good investment, somewhat riskier than Canadian bonds, but safer than bonds issued by the likes of China, Kuwait, Lebanon, Lithuania, Mexico, Turkey, Russia and Saudi Arabia.

Of the $1 billion U.S. in bonds purchased each year, 10 percent are sold to Canadian investors, not all of whom are Jews.

"Jewish investors have a very strong tradition of buying Bonds," Hartt says. "Financial institutions buy a large amount of them. In every institutional portfolio, there's a portion for sovereign securities."

While Jewish investors appreciate the good the funds can do in advancing the development of the Jewish state, even seeing Bonds as a "quasi-charitable" allocation, other investors are more interested in cooler calculations, like return on investment.

In that regard, Hartt says, Bonds shape up well and offer portfolio planners diversity across geographic regions.

Stanley Hartt

"They offer highly competitive rates, roughly two percentage points higher than current fixed rates at the chartered banks," says Sherry Cooper, executive vice-president and global economic strategist for the Bank of Montreal group of companies. Cooper, whose evaluation was distributed in Bonds promotional material, called the security "an investment vehicle worth considering."

In its most recent rate sheet, Bonds' five-year security offered 5.5 percent return (minimum purchase of $25,000), 5.25 percent if purchased in U.S. funds. Its zero coupon bonds, with a 10-year maturity, yield 6.7 percent.

Hartt says Bonds are used by the government of Israel on infrastructure projects.

"I believe State of Israel bonds do a tremendous job for Israel. It provides the stream of funding that can be used for the country's greatest needs," including projects that "make the desert bloom.

"This is a time of grave concern for the future of the State of Israel. As war reshapes alliances and roles, the path to peace seems less clear. All supporters of the State of Israel need to rally behind the continued support offered by the State of Israel Bonds organization."

Hartt believes there's room to improve Israel Bonds' profile in the investment community. One angle he's been pursuing is to make Israel Bonds more tradable, giving investors the right to buy and sell the security just as they would Canadian bonds.

At one point, when he was still giving technical advice to Israel Bonds, he was working on a a derivative product that would trade instead of the bond, but nothing ever came of it.

Nevertheless, he says, Bonds remain "an extremely worthwhile endeavour," even without any changes. "It has the benefit of providing funding to a state we all support, whose goals and aspirations we all support."

THOUSANDS ARE ANSWERING ISRAEL'S URGENT CALL.
HAVE YOU?

Something huge is happening in our community. It involves 1,000 volunteers and 17,000 donors to date. With $32 million pledged so far to UJA Federation Campaign 2002 and over $6 million in additional donations, we're well on our way to the most successful campaign in community history. But only with your help.

Israel needs us during these troubling times. The government has been forced to redirect $700 million U.S. from other vital services in order to meet mounting security costs. As a result, programs for Israel's vulnerable are threatened. Your gift increase will help to preserve services for them.

And this year, your gift increase will double on Israel's behalf, through the Challenge Fund, created by generous families in our community. The Challenge Fund will match all gift increases dollar for dollar. One million dollars from the Challenge Fund is waiting to be released. Only you can make it happen.

Please answer the call. Accept the challenge. Join the groundswell of support for Campaign 2002.

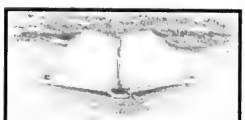
Jewish Life

When death is life

By RABBI MOSHE J. YERES

Chaye Sarah – what a name for a parshah! It seems almost cynical to identify the reading about the death and burial of our matriarch Sarah with the adjective "chaye" – life!

The rabbis in the Midrash note that here the Torah teaches us a great truth. An individual's life worth is not encapsulated only in the years spent on this Earth; the real and true significance often spills over after his or her passing.



History confirms that great inventors and thinkers often are unrecognized until many years after their death. It is not infrequent to hear of individuals honoured posthumously for their important work. The people may no longer be with us in body, but the legacy of their life lives on.

In truth, life – our lives – are sort of like that all the time. We do not always see the effects of today's actions, good or bad, until quite a bit down the road. Do a good deed and you have planted a seed; miss an opportunity for one and a pernicious weed has been left to take root. Both will eventually grow tall and big – but not at this moment. Right now, you see in the ground what looks like a tiny insignificant plant.

What important lessons we could learn if we kept records of all the "seedlings" we planted! Frequently, however, we just do not see the long-range effect of what we do or do not do today; we miss the overall outcome of our life's events.

The Talmud and the Midrash, in a number of places, point out the real strength of the faith of our patriarchs. Though HaShem promised and guaranteed Abraham, Isaac and Jacob the land of Israel, they never lived to actually see God's word come true.

When Abraham sought a place to bury Sarah, in this week's Torah reading, the Almighty did not present him with a special land grant; Abraham needed to haggle with Ephron the Hittite and pay full price – 400 silver shekels for a burial plot. Similarly, Isaac's shepherds argued with the shepherds of Gerar about water rights (Genesis 26:20). And a parallel event is recorded for Jacob, who could not pitch his tent without personally buying the land (Genesis 33:19).

Yet none of the patriarchs questioned the Divine promise, though each had received a personal promise from God that this was their land. None seemed to have lost trust in His word, even when they did not see an immediate response. They relied solely on their faith and trust in Him.

The last year has presented us with some extremely challenging situations for the State of Israel, for our people who live there, and sometimes for our faith. At times, we have asked: so where is the geulah (redemption)? How much longer? The patriarchs would not have asked that question, and in fact did not do so when confronted with similar difficulties.

The fact that Israel today is home to about five million Jews may alone be cause to recognize the Almighty's hand. Sure, we would all love it if true peace came today, and in fact we pray for this; but we cannot forget the Divine blessings that have already been granted.

I own an old Keren Kayemet LeYisrael (JNF) map, printed in Germany sometime before World War II. Whenever current events in Israel appear less than sanguine, I take a look at this map. The map marks off the Adamah Ivrit ("Jewish land") that was owned at that time. Only a minuscule part of the map is coloured in blue. How little land was actually ours only 80 years ago!

We have far to go; let us not forget how far we have come. The patriarchs did not.

Rabbi Moshe J. Yeres is head of rabbinics and Talmud at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Richmond Hill campus, and teaches in the community.

About Mordechai Ben-Porat

By SASSON MAYER

Last year, Mordechai Ben-Porat, a key figure in the immigration of Iraqi Jewry to Israel and their successful integration in Israeli society, was cited by the judges of the Israel Prize for his "life's work and willingness to undergo dangers for the sake of Israel and for his unbounded loyalty to the Zionist cause, his community and to all Israel."

After immigrating to Israel from Iraq in 1945 where he was a member of the chalutz movement, Ben-Porat joined the Haganah and in the War of Independence, he fought in the battles of Latrun, Lyda and Ramla. When the war ended, he was a commander of an infantry company in the IDF with the rank of major.

In 1950, when the martial laws that were declared in Iraq in May 1948 were lifted, many Jews, especially the young, began crossing the border secretly into Iran. What started as small numbers, two or three a month, became 10 and then hundreds, eventually including complete families. Mercaz Aliyah Bet in Israel decided to send Ben-Porat to help those who wanted to leave.

After Ben-Porat arrived secretly in Baghdad, the Iraqi government suddenly decided to allow those who wanted to leave to do so. On March 3, 1950, a law was passed allowing the Jews to register to leave, provided they relinquish their Iraqi nationality. The government assumed that about 10,000 Jews would go, but in the first 10 weeks more than 60,000 registered.

Ben-Porat found himself facing an enormous task with numerous complications. He stayed in Iraq until 1951, working alongside the Zionist underground organization. During his stay, he was arrested, arrested again and arrested for the third time together with myself. At that point, we faced unexpected difficulties in being released on bail – all three judicial levels available in Basra refused to grant it to us. It took 13 days in jail and an order from the Iraqi supreme court for us to be released.

Throughout that time, Ben-Porat used fictional names such as Zaki, Habib and Nissim, working directly under the noses of the Iraqi police as they searched – unsuccessfully – for members of the underground with these names.

Ten days after I left Iraq, Ben-Porat was arrested for the fourth time. Tortured cruelly during his imprisonment, he was miraculously released on bail. A few hours after his release the police realized that they had had the "big fish" in their hands, but by then it was too late. Ben-Porat was smuggled out of the country; at the dark end of the airport runway, he climbed up a rope lowered from the tail of a plane carrying some of the immigrants going to Israel.

After he escaped, two of the underground members were hanged and others were sentenced to long terms in prison.

In Israel, Ben-Porat started his political life as a representative of Mapai, heading a local council of ma'abarot (transit camps). Ma'abarot were established for 16,000 immigrants from Arab lands. There were no paved roads or electricity in the huts; water had to be brought in by trucks. Ben-Porat held this office for 14 years, during which time the dusty and muddy transit camp developed into a booming town, Or Yehuda.

In 1965, when David Ben-Gurion left Mapai to form the Rafi party, Ben-Porat joined him and was elected an MK. He later became deputy speaker of the Knesset. He served on numerous committees, such as foreign affairs and security, education and culture, state control, constitution, and law and justice. In 1977, he was member of an Israeli mission to the UN.

In 1979, when Iran's spiritual leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini was returned to Iran, Ben-Porat was sent by prime minister Menachem Begin to Tehran to try to help the Jews leave. In 1981, he returned to the Knesset and was eventually appointed a minister without portfolio in Begin's cabinet.

Ben-Porat's dearest achievement was the establishment of the Babylonian Jewry Heritage Centre in Or Yehuda, which contains an archive, a library, a historical ethnographic museum and a research and study centre of the history of the oldest Jewish community in the Diaspora. Since its opening in 1988, the centre has hosted more than 320,000 visitors, including 120,000 schoolchildren.

When he heard that he had won the Israel Prize, he said: "I am happy and excited. In my view this prize is given to Iraqi Jews who took an important part to build the State of Israel, its development and prosperity."

Sasson Mayer, who was born in Iraq, lives in Toronto.

Jewish Life

An age-old story

The Popes Against the Jews*, by David I. Kertzer, Random House, 2001.

Books
Bernard Baskin

In 1987, Pope John Paul II ordered the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations With the Jews to investigate whether the church was in any way accountable for the slaughter of millions of Jews earlier in the century. The commission returned 11 years later with a carefully worded report admitting that the church had been guilty of "anti-Judaism," that is, opposition to the Jewish religion, but not of anti-Semitism, opposition to the Jewish people.

Making use of documents from recently opened Vatican secret archives, David Kertzer, a professor at Brown University and author of The Kidnapping of Edgardo Mortara, refutes the commission's neat distinction between anti-Judaism and anti-Semitism. Unfortunately, the official church, Kertzer maintains, is unwilling to come to terms with its own history.

He writes that the legislation enacted by the Nazis in their Nuremberg Laws and by the Italian Fascists with their racial laws – which stripped the Jews of their rights as citizens – were modelled on measures that the Church itself had enforced for as long as it was in a position to do so. Jews in the Papal States were still being prosecuted in the 19th century when caught without the required yellow badge on their clothes, as mandated by Church councils for over 600 years.

"As late as the 1850s, the Pope was busy trying to evict Jews from most of the towns in the lands he controlled, and forcing them to live in the few cities that had ghettoes to close them in." The faithful were warned that Jews were unpatriotic, a foreign body ever threatening the well-being of the people among whom they lived. Therefore, special laws were needed to protect society, restricting the Jews' rights and isolating them.

In their unrelenting battle against social and political change in the later decades of the 19th century, the popes turned to the Catholic press, which was given the task of combating the wicked forces of liberalism and secularism. Jews were painted as evil conspirators – in cahoots with the Masons doing the devil's work. And it was in no small part through the Catholic press that traditional Church hostility toward the Jews was transformed into modern anti-Semitism.

When all is said and done, the author's thesis, documented by memos, confidential letters and archival material, is that, over several centuries, the Catholic Church laid the groundwork that made the Holocaust possible.

However, the author makes clear that, despite his findings, the Church is not monolithic and that there are important figures in the Church who struggled in vain to change Vatican policy and treat Jews more humanely.

For Kertzer, the Church's antagonism toward Jews is an age-old story of a powerful religion or powerful people that believes in its own divinely ordained position as sole possessor of the truth and repository of all that is good, and, pitted against it, a despised minority, the agent of the devil.

Kertzer concludes that it "should not have taken the Holocaust to teach us how dangerous such views of the world can be, but since the destruction of the Jewish millions, we owe it to the survivors and ourselves to learn its lesson."

Jewish storytellers online

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Leonard Nimoy, Eli Wallach, Carol Kane and Sholom Aleichem are all waiting to tell you a Jewish story. And you only have to go as far as your computer to hear them. In honour of Jewish Book Month, we're going to listen to the very best storytellers as they tell us a tale or two, online.

Sholom Aleichem is best known for his characters like Tevye the milkman, Yentah the matchmaker and the other citizens of Anatevka. Thanks to the Internet, you can listen to Sholom Aleichem himself read from Ven Ikh Bin Rotshild (If I were Rothschild – A rich man) which he recorded late in his life [http://www.yv.org/#sholom-alichem]. And if your Yiddish isn't quite up to scratch, you can read the same story (and a few others) in English too[http://www.sholom-aleichem.org/fsaws/Translantions/Translantionsmain.htm]

If you want to hear some more familiar voices, head over to Jewish Short Stories from Eastern Europe and Beyond. There are over 30 classic and contemporary short stories at this site read by some of the biggest names in Hollywood. Eli Wallach reads Gimpel the Fool by I.B. Singer. Lauren Bacall reads Isaiah Spiegel's A Ghetto Dog. I.L. Peretz's The Golem is read by Carol Kane. And who better to narrate Abraham Reisen's Matzah for the Rich than the wonderful Fyvush Finkel. Workers in a bakery are thrown into an uproar when they prepare to bake a demanding rich lady's matzah order. They fantasize about how generous a tip she'll leave – if she leaves one at all. I highly recommend this site [http://www.kcrw.org/b/jss.html].

Fans of the TV show, Law and Order, will remember the gruff but wonderful Manhattan District Attorney Adam Schiff. Steven Hill takes his turn as storyteller with the three tales Through the Moonlit Night, The True Patron and The Rabbi's Dilemma. [http://jewishworldreview.com/0798/audio.html]

Of course, you don't have to be a movie star to tell a Jewish story. Storytelling plays a huge part in the rabbinic tradition. At the Reb Shlomo Web site, you can read the marvelous stories of the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach. In Moishele, the Water Carrier, Rabbi Carlebach tells of a poor man who found riches, lost them all and then in his desperation, regained his faith [http://www.rebshlomo.org/story/]. For more chassidic stories, check out the large selection by Sterna Citron at 613.org [http://www.613.org/hasid.html]. And children can listen to Chayim the Storyteller as he presents a different Jewish tale for each week of the year [www.tzivos-hashem.org/storytime/storytime.html].

There are many excellent Jewish storytellers who visit schools and community centres throughout the year. The best way to find their Web sites is to go to a search engine like Google [http://www.google.com] and type in "Jewish storyteller." One of the names that will come up most often will be Peninah Schram, founding director of the Jewish Storytelling Center in New York. In The Artist's Search, Peninah Schram tells us of a restless man who set out to find the most beautiful scene to paint in the world. Is it a couple in love… a man who has discovered peace… the look of faith? Or is the answer much closer to home? [http://www.jewishmusic.com/stpsc10d.htm]

Schram explains why she loves telling her stories, especially to children.

"A story told can instil a sense of wonder in a child. If we don't tell them stories, we rob them of the chance for a healthy psychology and of really being connected to the Jewish values and traditions… It's the most important gift we can give a child." [http://www.jewishaz.com/jewishnews/980227/strytell.shtml]

Crusades hold lessons for current crisis: author

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The global crisis triggered by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in the United States is at heart a "morally ambiguous one," a best-selling author claims.

Holocaust Education Week

In a Holocaust Education Week lecture, James Carroll suggested that the current conflict, pitting the United States and its allies against the Islamic fundamentalist Taliban regime in Afghanistan, is not one exclusively between good and evil.

"This crisis is not about us and them," observed Carroll, saying that the origins of Islamic terrorism are rooted in the despair of poverty, the legacy of colonialism and the challenge of modernity.

Carroll, a former Catholic priest whose last book was Constantine's Sword: The Church and the Jews, was scheduled to speak on the history of the church's role in anti-Semitism from Jesus to the Holocaust.

Instead, he focused on the Christian Crusades to oust Muslim rulers from the biblical land of Israel (1096-1291) and the lessons to be drawn from them today.

Saying that the Crusades hardened attitudes toward Jews and thus isolated and demonized them in Christian societies, Carroll warned of the Crusaders' trap of dividing the world into warring camps.

As a result of the Crusades, Christian violence was loosed upon the universe, with disastrous consequences for Jews, who remained outside the "Christian consensus."

The Crusades set into motion a chain of related events, he explained.

Attempts to forcibly convert Jews to Christianity prompted a general suspicion of coerced conversions.

This, in turn, gave rise to the deadly concept of "blood impurity," which arose during the Spanish Inquisition.

The notion of blood impurity spawned modern anti-Semitism, which climaxed with Adolf Hitler's Holocaust.

Carroll said the Crusaders' obsession about "the enemy from within" may yet have contemporary applications.

In an oblique reference to Muslims living in the West, he said that Western paranoia about Islam could lead to a resurgence of anti-Semitism in North America, something Osama bin Laden is counting on.

And, he added ominously, Israel may yet be blamed for the present crisis.

Drawing one final lesson from the Crusades, Carroll noted, "God does not will the brutal death of any of God's creatures."

Justice, however, requires a firm military response to the events of Sept. 11: the elimination of bin Laden's Al Qaeda terrorist network.

A Shorenstein Fellow at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University, Carroll said that religious reconciliation through dialogue has done much to heal the breach between Jews and Christians.

But since Sept. 11, the need for dialogue has taken on "unprecedented urgency," he said, referring to the chasm between the West and Islam.

This problem, he pointed out, really began with the Crusades, which, for the first time, defined violence as a sacred act and assured its martyred combatants of a place in heaven.

The Crusades also institutionalized the idea of a bipolar world, the echoes of which still resound.

'The colour green (Islam) has replaced the colour red (communism) as the colour to fear."

Carroll said that the danger of a "clash of civilizations" can be mitigated if it is understood that "we're alike as human beings."

JWI helped me find my roots, new president says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Suzanne Borer, incoming national president of Jewish Women International (JWI), credits the organization with teaching her a new way to be Jewish.

Borer, who lives in Montreal, was born in Budapest, Hungary, where she says religion was not part of her life. "Before we left Hungary [when Borer was 11] we had to deny [our religion]. We escaped after it was discovered that we were Jewish."

When her family arrived in Saint John, N.B., in the mid-1950s, she says, one of the first women who greeted them wore a Star of David.

"My mother started to cry. It was the opposite experience of what we had left. People were warm and welcoming."

But during her first years in Canada, Borer, the mother of two grown children, did not "relate to the Jewish community. I never felt comfortable in synagogue, but I always felt a void inside me.

"I did not want my children to feel that way, so I sent them to Hebrew school, but I did not know what it felt like to be Jewish."

About 18 years ago, while working as a teacher – she has a diploma in special education – she was invited to join the Chomedey chapter of JWI. "I went to meet new people, to be part of a social group. I did not go because it was a Jewish organization."

Suzanne Borer

She felt included immediately, she says, and joined on the spot. "I quickly got involved; I began delivering Meals on Wheels, and worked at the bazaar. I was never an outsider."

Over the years, she has held such positions as president, JWI Montreal; national executive board member; chapter president; consultant to chapters, and she has served on several national committees.

When she got involved with JWI's Refusenik program in the 1980s, she says, "it really hit home. I could relate to them. I knew what it was like to have to hide something."

The organization has some very astute people who see the importance of leadership training, Borer says. "I learned those skills and developed confidence and people skills.

"Most of all, however, it was my first real Jewish connection. Jewishness took the form of belonging. It gave me an identity. It was a very warm feeling," she says.

During her two-year term, she plans to visit chapters across the country. "My goal is to position the organization to meet the needs of modern women and identify with societal needs.

"One of JWI's main purposes is to advocate on behalf of women, children and families, and work to end the cycle of violence.

"It is a very challenging time. There is a need for volunteer services but many women do not have the time. It is a challenge to find the perfect fit, to find ways of giving women a feeling of accomplishment. Even though we are surrounded by technology, the human need is still strong," she says.

Borer recently ran a program to attract new members, she says, and 18 women joined immediately. "We got down to the basics. We showed what the organization does, and they saw the solidity of our group; they saw we are a team.

"You can bring people to a room, but if you don't welcome them, they will not come back. A cause is not enough. They need human experience. They need to feel the same thing I did when I joined."

Rebbitzen Taub helped found BAYT sisterhood

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Judy Taub, rebbitzen of Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation of Toronto (BAYT), died last week after a long battle with cancer. She was 54.

Over 1,000 people, many weeping, crammed the main sanctuary of the synagogue for the funeral service. As a special mark of honour, her casket was carried by the chevrah kadishah into the sanctuary and placed before the bimah.

Rebbitzen Taub was born and raised in Toronto. When she married Rabbi Baruch Taub, she went with him on his rabbinic postings in Florida and Georgia, and then to New York, where he assumed the position of executive director of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth, the youth wing of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations.

In New York, she was involved in outreach, opening her home on a regular basis to youngsters looking for spiritual roots.

Yet it was when she came to Thornhill as rebbitzen of the fledgling Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto congregation that she really came into her own.

The shul's first service, a Selichot service, was held in her still-unfinished basement. Until the congregation's first home on Bevshire Circle was useable, regular services were held there, too. For the first few years, she served as synagogue secretary.

She helped found the congregation's sisterhood and remained an active, hands-on participant. She taught the bat mitzvah program and offered classes in the laws of family purity to both brides and women interested in beginning to observe those laws. One of her interests was in helping people find marriage partners.

Obituary

Judy Taub

Rebbitzen Taub was always ready to assist members of the congregation. She insisted on being on-call for those who needed to use the mikvah on Friday night or holidays, so that no other woman would have to leave her table on the holidays.

She was known for helping those families who were becoming observant, acting as a teacher, advisor and counsellor.

Rebbitzen Taub is survived by her husband, Rabbi Baruch Taub, children rabbis Shimon and Shmuel, Naomi, Gitty and Moshe, her parents, Jack and Renee Blustein, brothers Gary, David, Norman, and sister Sandra Klein, as well as 13 grandchildren, one of whom, a granddaughter, was born during the shivah.

Symposium planned on mood disorders

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Karen Liberman has touched a nerve in the Jewish community.

After an article appeared last winter in The CJN about her recovery from clinical depression, Liberman says she received about 100 phone calls.

"I was overwhelmed. So many people, both men and women, reached out to me to talk about their circumstances," said Liberman, president of the Mood Disorders Association.

As a result of that response, a symposium on Mood Disorders in the Jewish Community has been planned for Nov. 25 at Earl Haig Secondary School.

When people started calling her, she said, she realized that it may be because they felt comfortable talking to another Jewish person.

"Part of my mission is to get people to seek help [for their mood disorders], and it struck me that we should try to create an environment in which people can feel safe," said Liberman, the mother of two, and director of training and communications at the Social Planning council of Toronto.

She approached the Mood Disorder Association with the idea of putting together a symposium for the Jewish community "and they jumped at the chance. They had never tackled the issue in a way that is that specific to culture. For them, it would open other avenues, of pursuing other cultural groups."

She also took the idea to Dr. Anthony Levitt, the psychopharmacologist who had had set her on the road to recovery after about 10 years of clinical depression.

During those 10 years, she was hospitalized 17 times, treated by six psychiatrists, tried 27 types of medication, had a few suicide attempts, and underwent 24 electroshock therapy treatments.

"[Levitt's] inclination was that there is not much research done around [culturally specific] mood disorders, but it would be interesting to test it out," she said.

He agreed to put together a roster of Jewish professionals to speak at the symposium, she said. "Each speaker will talk on the area of their particular interest. Being one of the first symposiums of its kind, it really is very, very exciting."

There is no charge for the symposium, titled You are Not Alone, but registration is required, for either a half day, 9 a.m. to 12:15 p.m. or 1 p.m. to 3:45 p.m., or for the whole day. The program includes an address by both Liberman and Levitt, and as well as a number of workshops.

For information on the symposium, which is supported by Sunnybrook and Women's Health Sciences Centre, department of psychiatry, and Jewish Family & Child Services, call Lindsay Wetstein, 416-486-8046, ext. 227, or toll free at 1-888-486-8236, ext. 227. e-mail wetstein@mood-disorders. on.ca.

Toronto students help Kids for Kids organization

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although his physical wounds are mostly healed, Noam Rozenmen lives daily with the emotional scars from a suicide bombing in Israel. Talking to other kids is his therapy.

Rozenmen, a 20-year-old California native whose family has lived in Israel for 10 years, was injured four years ago in an attack on Ben Yehudah Street in Jerusalem.

He suffered multiple compound fractures to his leg, perforated ear drums, and second- and third-degree burns over 40 percent of his body.

Rozenmen now volunteers with Kids for Kids, an Israeli-based organization that has kids helping other kids who have been orphaned, maimed and traumatized by terrorism. He and fellow volunteer Jay Greenwald were here recently as guests of NCSY Canada, which brought them from Israel to establish links between the two organizations.

The pair's current speaking tour has been therapeutic for Rozenmen, said Greenwald, a Boston native who is assistant to the mayor of Gush Etzion, where he lives with his wife and three children.

"It is important for [Noam] to talk about his experience. It releases his emotions and helps him heal," Greenwald said in an interview.

Greenwald "jumped at the chance" to take part in a speaking tour that also includes Montreal, New York, Boston and Hartford. While here, he and Rozenmen spoke at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation and to students at several high schools.

It is "essential to put a human picture to what is going on in Israel. News reports do not talk about the physical and emotional scars that kids suffer. Noam has emotional scars that just don't go away," Greenwald said.

NCSY Canada president Daniella English, who did much of the organizational work to bring Rozenmen and Greenwald to Canada, said that people here usually only hear about the political side of what goes on in Israel.

"Our idea was to bring in someone who is not so far removed from our age – someone who can really make it hit home. We want kids to think that this could really happen to them," said English, 18.

Rabbi Glenn Black, regional director of NCSY, praised Kids for Kids' message "that you can make a difference to kids in Israel who have suffered from acts of terrorism, no matter where you are in the world."

Rabbi Black said that since Sept. 11, Canadians can identify more readily with what is going on in Israel, and "now when they read about something, they'll think of Noam's face."

There are two types of terrorist survivors in Israel, Greenwald said. "Noam is an example of a primary survivor.

"A secondary survivor is someone like my 11-year-old son, who last year witnessed a helicopter shooting a missile into an Arab village. He now [has sleeping problems] and sleepwalks because of that incident."

Many kids who have never had problems at school are now acting out, said Greenwald, and teachers need special training to learn how to deal with them. "Kids for Kids has put together a venue to teach these teachers."

Kids for Kids needs money to continue its work, he said.

One of the organization's local fund-raising projects has kids in Jewish day schools making mezuzot to sell, under the guidance of Kids for Kids local representative D'vorah Hoffman. The organization has also produced a CD of Israeli singing stars, which is due out in the next few months.

Proceeds from both projects will go to Kids for Kids.

Other projects include Hugs Across the Waters, which displays Israeli kids' artwork in North America, and a balloon project called Miracles Risin' on the Horizon, in which identical prayers are inserted into balloons in Canada and Israel and released simultaneously at NCSY Canada offices and at the Kotel on the first night of Chanukah.

Greenwald said response to the speaking tour "has given us strength. It will be emotionally uplifting to go back to Israel and tell the kids about what the kids in Canada are doing."

To help Kids for Kids, call NCSY at 905-761-6279.

Intergenerational Birthright pairs veterans, youth

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although Birthright Israel is a program for 18-to-26-year-olds, this December the Canada-Israel Experience Centre (CIEC) will count six septuagenarians and one 80-year-old among its Birthright participants.

The seniors are Canadians who volunteered in Israel's War of Independence in 1948. Their presence on the 10-day tour – which is free to young Jews who have never been on an educational trip to Israel – is made possible by a Birthright Israel grant for innovative programming.

In a proposal for the grant, Adam Minsky, UJA Federations Canada's director of Israel & Overseas Programs and director of National Jewish Campus Services, noted that the new program would enhance one of Birthright's educational themes, that of Zionist ideology.

Like the Birthright participants, Minsky wrote, the members of Machal – an acronym that stands for Mitnadvei Chutz L'Aretz, or overseas volunteers – were between the ages of 18 and 26 when they left Canada for Israel. "Unlike our participants," Minsky continued, "they did so based on the conviction that the struggle to achieve a Jewish Zionist state was a higher ideal."

Jeremy Leigh, a 36-year-old Jerusalem-based educator who was brought to Toronto recently to interview and write about the veterans in order to "set the scene" for participants, believes the project is unique and long overdue.

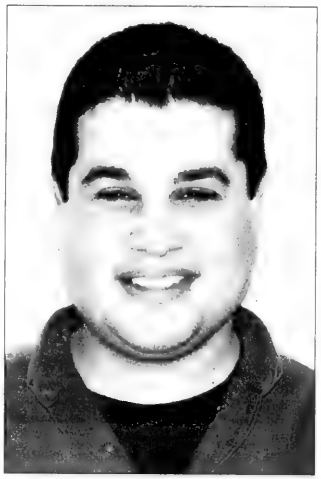
In an interview at the CIEC office, the British-born freelancer, who works mainly with overseas programs coming to Israel, said he hopes the project will raise awareness of the veterans' contributions, and also that others will be inspired by their stories.

"I'd be delighted if the participants deepen their connection to Israel as a result."

The 3,500 members of Machal at the time of the War of Independence included about 350 Canadians, approximately 60 of whom were from the Toronto area. A radio broadcast about the late Ben Dunkelman, the most senior-ranking Canadian Machalnik, inspired Minsky to conceive of the project.

Probably the best-known Machal veteran is British hairdressing mogul Vidal Sassoon.

Leigh hopes the young Birthright participants will realize the parallels between what the veterans did and other types of volunteering. "Luckily today it's not a matter of going off to fight, but the value of volunteering is no less important," he said.



Adam Minsky

The Toronto Machal veterans, a group of about two dozen, decided amongst themselves who would go on the Birthright trip.

"They're a great bunch of guys," said Leigh, after completing most of his interviews. One, he noted, travelled to Israel on holiday during the Gulf War.

Leigh found the veterans had volunteered for one of two reasons: in the wake of the Holocaust and after 2,000 years, they felt Jews were entitled to a state; or, they volunteered for the adventure and picked up the Zionism while they were away.

"We were motivated to go and fight," Ben Ocopnick, 77, told The CJN. "We were offered nothing. We were putting our lives on the line, but we didn't care. After we saw what happened in Europe, we wanted there to be a state."

A veteran of the Royal Canadian Air Force (virtually all the Machalniks had military experience during World War II), Ocopnick had been to Palestine in 1947, ferrying Holocaust survivors from Sweden and Italy on the Aliyah Bet.

When Israel was proclaimed a state, Ocopnick was on a hilltop outside Jerusalem. After three days of fighting, he recalled, he and other members of his unit were running low on ammunition and water. "We wanted to get out of there," he recalls.

It is expected that the veterans will tell their stories at some of the sites where they actually took place.

"This is a real story about real people, and they're transmitting history to another generation," said Leigh. "It's a very Jewish concept. I think everyone's going to come out of this better for it."

Toronto General & Western Hospital Foundation is pleased to announce the naming of the Reuben & Florence Fenwick Coronary Intensive Care Unit in the Peter Munk Cardiac Centre at Toronto General Hospital

Reuben and Florence Fenwick, and their children, long-time supporters of Toronto General Hospital and Toronto Western Hospital.

The Reuben and Florence Fenwick Coronary Intensive Care Unit accommodates a total of 14 patients experiencing a variety of complex coronary problems. In addition to naming the Unit, the Fenwick Family's gift has established a fund to purchase equipment which will enhance patient care.

Toronto General Hospital's Cardiac Program is known for its superior patient care, innovative research and education. With the addition of this new equipment, the Peter Munk Cardiac Centre at Toronto General Hospital will continue as one of the world's leading centres for cardiac research and education.

The Toronto General & Western Hospital Foundation is grateful to be the recipient of this gift.

Harbord Collegiate's class of 1951 holds reunion

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Harbord Collegiate Institute, which was once a centre of activity for Jewish teens in Toronto and holds many wonderful memories for its graduates, recently held its 50th reunion party.

The dinner at the Inn on the Park for the class of 1951 brought together 103 graduates, spouses and partners from across Canada, New Jersey, Connecticut, Maryland, and California.

The following morning, the alumni were honoured at an award assembly in the Harbord auditorium, which was followed by a luncheon.

Debbie (Bliman) Cowitz and Kaylee (Gollom) Miller, members of the 1951 graduating class, co-chaired the reunion planning committee. Bob Yasny, a retired dentist, served as master of ceremonies.

Miller described the 1951 graduates as "vibrant seniors who are delighted to mark this grand occasion." For many Jews who attended Harbord from the late 1920s to the 1950s, she said, "the very name of Harbord Collegiate Institute is enough to evoke warm special memories and emotions."

Cowitz told The CJN that the evening "was a chance to return to our youth and relive some of the fun we had growing up as teenagers in that community. It was magic."

At the cocktail reception, amidst displays of memorabilia, festive decorations and music from the 1940s and Gilbert and Sullivan, the former students became re-acquainted and exchanged stories with longtime friends. A memorial board paid tribute to the 20 students who had died.

The Reunion Minstrels – Annette (Pinkus) Bot, Hal Brudner, Sy Caine, Ruth (Kraft) Sherman, Paula (Rotstein) Rich and Sylvia (Berlin) Zoberman, with Cowitz on the keyboard – entertained with show tunes laced with Harbord lyrics.

Throughout the evening, the graduates reminisced with nostalgia and humour. Ruth (Abramovitz) Drexler of Los Angeles, the valedictorian of the class of 1951, spoke of her memories of being a teenager at the time.

Marvin Tile, a doctor who was scheduled to speak at a medical convention in Boston that night, chose to speak to the convention by satellite and to attend the reunion. He spoke of the 1951 Harbord student riot, which was referred to as "A tempest in a tea pot" and was reported in the newspapers.

Alene (Kamins) Daniels came from Los Angeles with her husband Stan Daniels, an Emmy award-winning producer, director and writer. Daniels delighted the audience with his piano rendition of The Butler's Song from his 1970s Broadway musical So Long 174th Street.

Harvey Hecker said the members of the 1951 class were first-generation Canadians whose parents were the driving force for them to get a good education and excel.

Yasny told The CJN that "the '51 reunion was all that we had hoped for and more. It was reflective, gratifying and fun, and the evening evoked that wonderful spirit that is still retained by all Harbordites."

ONCE AGAIN, BEIT HALOCHEM IS THERE FOR OUR HEROES

Asaf and his family made Aliyah to Israel in 1991. Prior to his 18th birthday he joined a combat unit in the Israeli army, stationed in the occupied territories.

A tragic incident occurred. "My good friend died on the spot when his neck was broken and 3 other soldiers with me were injured."

Asaf was hospitalized for 3 months. At first he was unaware of the extent of his injuries, but as Asaf weaved in and out of consciousness, the horror of his reality began to set in. Asaf's injuries were critical and his entire leg was amputated.

Beit Halochem was immediately there to help Asaf. Their representatives visited him regularly, offering him encouragement, guidance, support and most recently, found suitable housing for him. When discharged from hospital, Asaf will visit Beit Halochem daily for physio and hydrotherapy treatments. Slowly he will gain the ability to participate in the sports and recreational programs offered.

Beit Halochem is a special centre for veterans facing physical and emotional injuries. It is a place where everyone fits in, feels comfortable, is protected, welcomed and cared for.

The four Beit Halochem Centres in Israel offer both physical and emotional rehabilitation to disabled veterans and their families.

Your support will ensure that our heroes receive the coaching, wheelchairs, physiotherapy devices, specialized equipment, cultural activities and sports facilities that they need. Their needs are our top priority! Please...give generously.

The other 50,000 disabled veterans also have the ATTITUDE to reach their potential.

NCSY offers high school credit for after-school study

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Torah High now offers a high school credit in religious studies.

The Ministry of Ontario Grade 10 credit, to be granted through Ner Israel Yeshiva, can be earned by completing 110 hours of study, assignments and tests.

Torah High, an after-school educational program of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), is targeting the 7,500 Jewish public high school students not enrolled in any Jewish education program, said Torah High director Rabbi Yechiel Goldreich.

With classes at three locations, Rabbi Goldreich is hoping to attract kids from across the city.

"For many, Jewish education stops in Grade 8." After that, he said, "not enough is being done to reach Jewish kids in public schools."

NCSY will mail the credit to a student's home school, where it will be up to the principal to decide what to do with the grade. However, almost every school in Toronto has said they will accept the credit, Rabbi Goldreich said.

For the past eight years, Torah High has held informal learning groups. The program seems to have attracted most of its students from public schools with low Jewish populations, Rabbi Goldreich said.

"The program gives kids from public schools the opportunity to meet other Jewish kids."

The student mix in each location is different, he said. "The majority of our students do not come from religious homes."

Some have had a formal Jewish day school education, or a limited after-school background. Others haven't had any Jewish education at all, Rabbi Goldreich said.

While most of Torah High's teachers are drawn from NCSY staff, tutoring services in general studies will be given this year by local university students, Rabbi Goldreich said.

Also included will be informal trips and social events. Shabbatons are being planned and guest speakers will be brought in.

The program is open to students of all ages and the kids decide on their own level of involvement, the rabbi said.

Classes are free and refreshments are served. For more information, call Rabbi Goldreich at 905-761-6279, ext. 25.

Enriching Jewish Life

Jewish Life in Toronto is getting a big boost thanks to the latest round of UJA Federation Jewish Continuity Grants. The Action Committee for Jewish Continuity, chaired by Glennie Lindenberg, has awarded $90,000 to ten distinct organizations who share one common goal - strengthening Jewish identity in the GTA. Their commitment and creativity are highlighted in these two pages.

Lemaz-el Tov

A new course offered by Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learing will provide expectant couples the opportunity to learn about childbirth and child rearing all at the same time.

Lemaz-el Tov will prepare first-time parents with instruction on everything "from delivery to planning the perfect Brit Milah and much more," says Kolel's Rabbi Elyse Goldstein. "The outreach program combines physical childbirth with Judaic content, such as how to raise Jewish children and how to run a Jewish household."

"It's also a great opportunity for young couples to become more connected to their community," adds Goldstein, who reports tremendous interest in the 6-8 week course, which is scheduled to begin next spring.

Exercising Jewish Minds

The Jewish Personal Trainer program is partnering people for one-on-one Jewish educational experiences.

"It's learning by doing," explains JPT program coordinator Loretta Tanenbaum, who has matched eight personal trainers and trainees exploring everything from kashering a kitchen to learning to read Torah since Beth Tzedec launched the project last March.

Tanenbaum says the customized coaching technique allows participants to enhance their Jewish living while creating a community of learners.

unusual setting of a neighbourhood coffee shop Bernie Burstyn has been helping David Wintre delve deeper into understanding the significance of Jewish prayer. "It's a wonderful opportunity for people to ask questions and get answers in an informal setting," says Burstyn, an ordained Rabbi.

"It's been a very satisfying experience," adds Wintre. "There are not too many other ways to talk about important Jewish matters with a trained expert."

Russians Returning to Roots

A cozy place for young people to explore their Jewish identity. That's what Maon Noam has been providing a growing number of Jewish Russian youth living in Toronto.

Thanks to a UJA Federation Jewish Continuity Grant, Maon Noam will be expanding its youth outreach, at a time when it's needed more than ever. "In Russia, anti-Semitism kept Jews together," explains Irina Petrini, Chairman of Maon Noam's Board of Directors. "Here the threat of assimilation is much stronger, especially among teenagers."

Russian youth partake in Purim celebrations.

Maon Noam will offer a wide range of fully subsidized programs, including seminars, Shabbatons, films, picnics and other social events organized around Jewish themes and traditions.

"Our main goal is to make young people feel welcome and comfortable in their own community."

Reach for Respect

Learning the Jewish method of saying "thank you" is just one way Project Derech will teach more Jewish children about the importance of respecting others as well as themselves.

"Respect is the foundation and lubricant of a strong Jewish community," says Shanie Aberback, who is expanding production and distribution of the Reach for Respect workbook for students in Toronto's day and supplementary school system.

Aberback says the innovative workbook, already in some schools, teaches values based in Torah and builds on Judaism's strong tradition of respect.

"The program is designed to bring all Jews closer to this important legacy we have given the world."

Rah! Rah! Tzedakah!

You're never too young to learn about tzedakah at the Jewish Discovery Place Children's Museum.

Shelly Weinstein and her son Aaron try out the Discovery Museum's tiny Torah for size.

In fact, the museum's new interactive tzedakah exhibit is designed specially to acquaint young children with community organizations and show them how they can make tzedakah a part of their lives.

Now, thanks to a new outreach project funded by a Jewish Continuity Grant, more students will be able to experience the exhibit right in their own classroom as well as at the museum.

"This two part program allows us to reach more kids and teach them how to get involved with their community," explains Debbie Fenichel, Director of Exhibits and Fundraising for the Museum, located in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. "It's a great way to show them that you're never too young to make a difference."

Learning to Love

Young Jewish professionals can now take a crash course in courtship to learn the secrets to a successful relationship.

Leading relationship expert Rabbi David Green will cover topics such as love, dating and intimacy in this four-part workshop series sponsored by Aish HaTorah beginning next May.

"The program is designed to bring Jewish singles together in a relaxed environment to learn how to be successful at building strong, lasting relationships," explains Rabbi Dan Rand, Director of Young Professionals at Aish HaTorah. "It goes beyond just dating in exploring Judaism's rich tradition regarding matters of the heart."

Sasson V'Simcha

Volunteer match-makers in Toronto's Orthodox community are mixing traditional techniques with innovative initiatives to unite singles of all ages.

"Our goal is to bring people of similar interests and backgrounds together," explains Rebbetzin Jenni Ochs, founder of the Sasson V'Simcha network that maintains a registry of single men and women from as far away as Cleveland and Montreal.

The organization will use its UJA Federation Jewish Continuity Grant to expand programming, which include seminars on dating.

"You would be surprised how many people don't know how to date," explains Ochs. "We see it as our job to get them on the right track."

Regesh Restores Hope

Children living in treatment foster homes are finding comfort in the Jewish community through a program run by Regesh Family & Child Services.

The Jewish Identity Mixed Modality Program helps emotionally disturbed children aged 5-16 with minimal Jewish awareness, come closer to the Jewish community through holiday celebrations and Jewish learning.

"We try to give these children, many of whom suffer from disturbing pasts, positive, new experiences from which to move forward," explains Edwin Schild, Executive Director of Regesh. "The children exposed to JIMM have blossomed beautifully."

Creating Community

UJA Federation 2001

Enriching Jewish Life

Participants in the Creative Retreat Program, now in its second year, explore Jewish themes through workshops led by students at the bi-annual two day retreat, scheduled for January and May.

Artist Limore Tweena poses proudly in front of her painting at Colouring Ourselves 2001 exhibit.

The program, run by Jewish Campus Services, is a follow-up to acclaimed "Colouring Ourselves" Festival of Jewish Student Creativity.

"It's a wonderful way for young Jewish adults to strengthen their ties to Judaism as well as engage in leadership skills training and community building," says JCS Arts and Culture Coordinator Sarah Zelcer.

Al Galgalim

Thornhill's Family Resource Centre is reaching out to unaffiliated Jewish families through the joy of hands-on holiday celebrations.

Al Galgalim (Training Wheels), which begins just in time for Chanukah, invites parents and children to learn about Jewish holidays together and create their own ritual objects in order to observe holiday festivals in the home.

"It's a wonderful way to expose families to Jewish customs and traditions in a pressure-free environment," says Joanna Sasson Morrison, Coordinator of the Family Resource Centre.

'Mentoring' program to be launched at Hillel

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — There is more need than ever for young people to have mentors, believes retired executive Irving Gubitz.

Gubitz, 71, who has served as both a mentor and, as he put it, a "mentee," said that mentorship has played an invaluable role in both his personal and professional lives.

A one-time president of British Steel of Canada, Gubitz, who retired in 1996, is currently planning a mentoring program at the Hillel Jewish Student Centre that he hopes will help young people make the right life decisions.

When he began his plans two years ago, he said, "It seemed like a helluva good idea."

What Gubitz has in mind is not a placement service for young people to find jobs, he stressed.

Rather, the program will aim to connect the right young people with the right mentors, role models who will provide guidance and advice for young people making difficult career and life decisions.

"They will help them define what things to think about," Gubitz said.

The program, which he hopes to launch next spring, still requires a fair amount of organizing, he said.

"First, we have to get the appropriate people as mentors and 'mentees,' and to develop a screening process to match them up.

"Then we need a means of determining how things are going, to see if things are 'clicking' between them.

"[The program] will also need an administrative procedure to determine if what we set out to do is, in fact, being done."

It will also feature a "functioning committee" to assess its success, he said.

Right now, Gubitz said, he only has the broad strokes in mind. The concrete details are yet to be worked out. He did, however, choose Hillel as the site after consulting with contacts at the YM-YWHA and McGill University.

When asked if there is more need now for such a program than before, Gubitz said he thinks so.

"People used to grow up in relatively tight-knit communities," he said. "You always had pressure to do certain things – that hasn't changed – but now I think there's a difference because the choices are greater."

In today's Internet age, he said, choices are "worldwide" and "problems and decision-making are now more complicated.

"In other words, because there are more choices, it's harder to make one."

It's also important that young people have access to a program away from family influences, he said.

"When I meet you for the first time, I don't have an agenda," Gubitz said.

He likened people seeking mentors to a "blank piece of paper" who would be encouraged to do their best at what they're best at doing.

As for the mentors, "we will be looking for people with experience, knowledge and judgment," Gubitz said. They will be come from Gubitz's own network of contacts and through the McGill Alumni Association.

Gubitz made it clear that such mentors don't have to be "old and retired or business people."

"A mentor can be anyone who is interested in other people."

School dress codes

applying it. A lot depends on their judgement and integrity.

There is also the question of role modelling. It's hard to discipline students for streaking their hair with blue or green when the teacher's own hair is highlighted with gold.

Young warns that enforcement could become inconsistent, leading to confusion and dismay. Children can easily become jaded and cynical over what they perceive to be an arbitrary application of rules.

While the Ontario Ministry of Education has directed schools, in co-operation with parents through their school councils, to implement dress policies for students, it leaves it up to each school to develop their own code. The minimum requirement for all schools prohibits profane or discriminatory language.

A school uniform can be implemented with a majority vote of 80 percent of the parents.

David Moore, principal of Summit Heights Elementary School, notes that there are advantages to uniforms. With vague dress codes, administrators could wind up spending more time dealing with the appropriateness of messages on T-shirts than with running schools.

In some areas of the city, Moore noted, uniforms can increase security. "It becomes very easy to spot who doesn't belong in the school."

Interestingly, uniforms are mandatory in most private independent schools.

At Montcrest School, principal Elaine Danson said uniforms provide a level playing field.

"Uniforms remove a certain competitiveness so that the kids' personalities can shine through," she said.

Around the age of 13, students tend to make the uniforms their own, she added. They don't need expensive shoes or sweaters to express themselves. "Their personalities show through in the way they roll their sleeves or wear their skirts."

When it comes to clothes, parents have said they are relieved that mandatory uniforms are in place, Danson said. This way the rules are clear and set by the school, removing an element of tension from the home.

Director of education at Bialik Hebrew Day School, Uri Korin said last year uniforms were discussed by the parent body and dismissed. Korin is aware that some parents prefer uniforms for older children because it can reduce the fighting that goes on at home over what to wear.

As in all aspects of education, schools and parents have to work together to find the best solutions for kids, Korin said.

With clothing, there are issues of conformity versus creativity and individuality. Uniforms are often considered to be an attempt to control a child's freedom of expression.

However, some administrators feel that in today's fashion environment, which includes piercings, tattoos and unnatural hair colours, students can try to push limits.

"Our experience here has been that, on occasion, the kids come into school and try to shock us," Korin said. "We only intervene when their dress inhibits the educational process. With few exceptions, when we ignore it, the kids stop caring about it."

CAMP RAMAH IN CANADA

The Max and Beatrice Wolfe Campus

Position open for

FULL-TIME

CAMP DIRECTOR

Camp Ramah in Canada (located just north of Bracebridge, Ontario) is looking for an energetic, experienced forward-thinker with a background in camping to serve as its Director for the summer camp and related programs. Lead an exciting educational camp that conveys the depth, beauty and spirit of Jewish life and community.

Candidates must possess strong leadership, administrative and interpersonal skills, and be able to work with an active volunteer Board. They should also have advanced training in Judaica and fluency in Hebrew.

Candidates should be personally committed to Jewish camping consistent with the values and practices of Conservative Judaism. This is a full-time, year-round position preferably based in the Toronto area (when not at camp). Salary and benefits are commensurate with experience.

"Israel was singled out as the apartheid state of our time, a perpetrator of crimes against humanity, the new anti-Christ, that must be dismantled."

When terrorists attacked the United States a few days after the conference ended, Cotler felt he had seen the writing on the wall.

"The conference has been overshadowed by the tragic events of Sept. 11, but the conference foreshadowed Sept. 11," he said. "If Durban was a wake-up call for the Jewish community, Sept. 11 was a wake-up call for the world... I'm not saying there is a causal relationship but there is a connection."

Jews were totally unprepared for the WCAR, unlike the Palestinians and their supporters, Cotler said.

"From the time the conference was announced three years ago, they [the Palestinians] were off and running. It was not until July of this year that the Jewish community leadership held a meeting on the conference. As late as last June, most of the Israeli cabinet did not even know it was taking place."

'Cotler praised the Canadian delegation for the strong position it took against the attacks on Israel'

The result, Cotler said, was that the worldwide Jewish community failed to make the "distinguishable" contribution it could have made to a discussion on how to combat racism, and instead, the WCAR itself became a forum for racism.

And the onslaught didn't start in Durban, he noted. At a preparatory regional conference in Tehran in February, from which Israel and Jewish NGOs were excluded, a declaration was drawn up that accused Israel of genocide.

The declaration is "the most scurrilous against Israel and the Jewish people since World War II," Cotler said.

"Someone should have sounded the alarm then. But it was greeted with silence... No one in the UN leadership protested, and we [Jews] chose to ignore it."

Cotler also criticized the two main documents that came out of Durban.

The NGO declaration – which was not an official conference document but was signed by such respected groups as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch – is "the most indicting document to come out of an international conference... [it amounts to] a blueprint for the dismantling of Israel," he said.

And the official inter-governmental declaration, which does not explicitly equate Zionism with racism but endorses the right of Palestinian refugees to return to Israel and condemns Palestinian suffering, also has serious implications for the Jewish State, Cotler believes.

The Israeli delegation, he said, was wrong to have said the latter document was "the greatest victory of Israeli diplomacy" because it was not as bad as it could have been.

"I think we are starting to suffer from the Stockholm syndrome. When people say things about us that are not as bad as we feared, we are grateful," he said.

Cotler praised the Canadian delegation for the strong position it took against the attacks on Israel, yet he is concerned that Durban has already been forgotten in Ottawa.

"Everywhere in Parliament – in the Commons, in the caucus, in committees – each day since Sept. 11 has been dominated by those tragic events, but not one word has been said in Parliament about Durban."

Coast to Coast

Casualties and heroes

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

As has been evident over the past six weeks, the international crisis precipitated by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks has generated lots of political casualties and not a few new or reborn political heroes.

Although he hasn't really irritated anyone, the prime minister hasn't exactly demonstrated real leadership during this prolonged crisis. He fumbled the ball a couple of times at the outset and never seemed to fully recover the momentum. He is frequently absent from the House during question period – especially now that Herb Gray has rebounded from his latest health challenge – and seems content to use the situation to let the various leadership hopefuls expend their energies against one another. Herb may have had the open-heart surgery, but it seems that the PM is the one on heart bypass.

Finance Minister Paul Martin is another short-term loser. Economic woes, coupled with Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley's spectacular profile-boost, have dampened his spirits.

With the prospect of an unpopular budget looming next month, there is little chance that he will be in the holiday spirit when the House recesses for the Christmas break.

Canadian Alliance leader Stockwell Day, on the other hand, is a short-term winner and continues to show poise. How long his run lasts depends on what he decides before year's end about his future with the party. I'm betting he probably feels the worst is behind him and that he ought to go for the gold!

Other opposition leaders haven't fared quite so well. It's no surprise that Alexa McDonough and her party have come out against everything from tighter immigration and border controls to the anti-terrorist legislation, not to mention the military campaign. They have simply re-confirmed that, as currently configured, the NDP is long past its "best before" date.

Tory leader Joe Clark is proof that the safe bet is not always the winning bet. As a long-serving foreign minister – including during the Gulf War – one would have thought that he was perfectly positioned to demonstrate his experience, wisdom and leadership. Yet despite all those advantages, Clark has shown that lack of political judgement remains his dominant trait. The leader of the fifth party backs the government when he should be challenging it (such as when Solicitor General Lawrence MacAulay boasted that CSIS gave information to U.S. authorities about an imminent terror threat) and criticizes when he should be showing solidarity (such as when he whined about a lack of hourly briefings in the first 72 hours of the crisis).

In cabinet intramurals, ministers Alan Rock, David Collenette and MacAulay have slipped in the standings, just slightly ahead of Brian Tobin. Elinor Caplan and Art Eggleton each get a point for managing loaded portfolios (Immigration and Defence) with reasonable skill, and Justice Minister Anne McLellan gets two bonus points for showing willingness to accommodate civil-rights concerns regarding the anti-terrorism legislation. But Manley, who started in a deficit position, is alone at the top of the standings after scoring big back-to-back wins in snagging the chairmanship of a ministerial committee on domestic security and returning from a whirlwind Middle East tour virtually unscathed. Before this is over, Manley may turn from the dark horse of the Liberal leadership race into the white knight.

The world changed after Sept. 11

with hate. Last July, I published an article in the French magazine Le Point that dealt with the disastrous consequences of terrorism. The editor-in- chief, who is a close friend, was somewhat surprised by my choice of subject.

"Why do you want to publish your thoughts on a problem that is not currently in the news?" he asked me. It's true that at that moment, terrorism was not a topic of great concern. Unfortunately, since the terrible tragedy that plunged America into mourning on Sept. 11, people realize bitterly that terrorism is the greatest danger threatening us in the 21st century. I am very afraid the unspeakable acts that recently devastated the United States are only the beginning of a malevolent, criminal and murderous plan that aims to sow chaos in the free and democratic world.

CJN: How do you react when you see the images of the thousands of poverty-stricken, homeless refugees fleeing Afghanistan?

EW: The unbearable images of those tens of thousands of refugees fleeing Afghanistan, which I see every day on TV, break my heart. To see those men, women, old people, children... leaving their native land to escape the warlike insanity of Osama bin Laden and his fanatic followers is a distressing sight – 1.5 million uprooted human beings forced into exile. It's scandalous. But we have to remember that these helpless refugees are not the victims of America. They are the victims of the Taliban. America attacked the Taliban because they shelter and protect the terrorists who carried out the criminal attacks of Sept. 11.

Unfortunately, all wars cause the death of innocent people. One thing is certain: I cannot conceive of an American pilot intentionally bombing a hospital, a school or a house. I don't believe it for a fraction of a second. It's impossible. In all wars, there are mistakes and damage is done.

CJN: A new spectre is now haunting the West: bioterrorism, the possible recourse to massive destruction caused by bacteria or chemicals. We can see today that Islamic terrorists are exploiting for evil purposes the speedy progress being made by science and technology.

EW: The terrorists are exploiting and abusing the triumphs achieved in the last few decades by the scientific mind. Science can help life. The advances of science are a vibrant tribute to the glory of mankind. Nevertheless, science can also be exploited for less noble purposes and it can be used against humanity. That's what the terrorists close to bin Laden are doing. I believe that America is currently waging a just war because it is a question of a war against war, of a battle whose aim is to combat what is harming humanity. The spectre of bioterrorism is now a real danger that cannot be avoided. Imagine terrorism with the force of a nuclear or bacteriological strike. It would be a total disaster. Hundreds of thousands of innocent people could die. It is absolutely necessary to stop this piercing danger.

'Durban was a disaster'

CJN: The problems at the international conference on racism in Durban confirmed your analyses of anti-Semitism.

EW: That conference was a disaster. UN secretary general Kofi Annan, who is a personal friend of mine, and Mary Robinson, the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, invited me to participate. I accepted the invitation, because I believed this was a very important conference that, in principle, should combat racism and intolerance worldwide. A few weeks before the conference, I asked Ms. Robinson to send me the working texts being prepared for the conference. When I read those texts, I couldn't believe my eyes. The hatred of Israel and America that burst forth from them shocked me greatly. I refused to participate.

CJN: Was your decision irrevocable?

EW: Yes. They put pressure on me to reconsider, but I was firm and categorical. I did not want my name to be associated with a forum that was basically anti-Israel, where the Jews and the Americans were going to be vehemently denounced. In any event, no one would have listened to my intervention. I still don't believe that 2,000 non-governmental organizations agreed to support such a hateful and venomous resolution against Israel. Nevertheless, they did it. A resolution that was rejected by the general assembly of the conference. Durban was an unprecedented disaster for the United Nations as well as for all the groups that voted to adopt those vile texts.

CJN: Didn't you want the members of the European Union and Canada to leave the conference?

EW: I wanted the countries of the European Union, as well as Canada, to leave, at least symbolically. That is, that as a protest, they would leave the conference for at least an hour, and then come back. Even if it was only symbolically, I didn't want them to let Israel and the United States be the only ones to leave. Still, I realize that Canada and several European countries accomplished something remarkable. As a result of their work, less damage was done. However, it is also true that if the European countries and Canada had left, as did Israel and the United States, the Durban conference would not have had any credibility from the very beginning.

CJN: At Durban, they also struck a blow at Jewish memory with contemptible analogies between the behaviour of the State of Israel against the Palestinians and the bestiality of the Nazis who victimized the Jews during World War II.

EW: That's no secret to anyone. Those who attack Jewish memory today do so because they hate the State of Israel. Since the Jewish State takes its inspiration from that memory, those who hold Israel up to public disgrace are also pouring scorn on that memory. In the United States, those who write pamphlets against Jewish memory are the same people who never cease to violently and viciously attack Israel.

CJN: The State of Israel has become the scapegoat par excellence. The Jewish State has been accused of being responsible for all the ills destroying humanity. It has even been held responsible for the monstrous attacks committed by the Islamic terrorists on Sept. 11. This anti-Israel madness is very worrisome.

EW: You're right. But that hatred and madness against Israel is not new. The attacks inspired by bin Laden don't have anything to do with Israel, strictly speaking. To state the contrary would be a lie. Bin Laden has been planning these attacks in detail for a long time. At the time when he was cooking up his attack, the Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations were at their height. Israelis and Palestinians were then very close to concluding a historic agreement.

Bin Laden is a megalomaniac. He therefore had to attack the great, namely the Americans. Israel was too small for him. He never mentioned Israel in his misplaced speeches. Only recently has he begun to refer to Israel. It's an outlet he is cynically exploiting to justify his criminal acts.

CJN: Does the word "hope" still have any meaning since the terrible tragedy of Sept. 11?

EW: Yes. In spite of all the repulsive tragedies in the world, we do not have the right to get bogged down in despair and depression. Albert Camus said that where there is no hope, we must invent it, create it. It's true that in these times it is difficult to hope. Yet we have no choice. We cannot replace hope.

Christina's restored to former glory in GreekTown

Long revered as a late-night hot spot, Christina's had seen its popularity as a Greek dining destination ebb somewhat in recent years as trendy new Greek restaurants emerged while its own decor and menu aged.

With a complete facelift and an updated, classically Greek menu, new owners Bill and Kathy Vomvolakis have taken decisive steps towards restoring Christina's lost lustre.

The commitment to a brighter, sunnier Christina's is immediately evident. You can see it in the freshly-painted golden frontage, complete with elegant new wrought-iron signage. You can see it in the cleaner, crisper, warmer interior, where the interplay of earth tones, buttercup yellow and turquoise forms a soothing backdrop for newly-restored Greek etchings, sculptures, soft candlelight, and ironwork. You can see it in the cozy, slightly elevated dining area at rear, beautifully renovated to accommodate small, intimate gatherings. No stone, it seems, has been left unturned in improving the premises; from floor to ceiling, washrooms to heated patio, virtually everything has been uplifted, upgraded, and refinished.

A few friendly reminders of the old Christina's remain: the picture collage of celebrity guests in the entranceway; the late hours (still open for supper until 1 a.m. Sunday to Thursday, 4 a.m. Friday and Saturday); live Greek music and belly dancing Friday and Saturday night.

Most of all, Christina's renaissance is apparent in the food. Traditional yet up-to-date, its new menu recaptures the essence of fine Greek dining. Portions are generous, prices very reasonable, the wine selection greatly expanded. Fittingly, this rebirth coincides with the return of Christina's original chef.

One bite of the dolmades (homemade stuffed grapevine leaves) tells you that Christina's is back; both the beef and vegetarian varieties resonate with fresh herbs. The assorted dip platters (Pikilia Mezedakia, cold; Christina's Pikilia, hot & cold) are both teeming and delicious. The salads are crisp and distinctively Greek. The Horiatiki (tomatoes, cucumbers, green peppers, onions, kalamata olives and feta cheese) and the Maroulosalata (crisp romaine lettuce, spring onion and dill tossed in an extra-virgin olive oil vinaigrette) underscore Christina's return to the forefront of Greek restaurants.

Fresh fish and seafood lovers will be particularly pleased with Christina's new direction. Maritime innovations abound throughout the menu, from appetizers to salad to soup. There's even a seafood souvlaki! The Greek Island Seafood Soup is heartwarmingly flavourful, the Grilled Seafood Salad on organic baby greens in lemon thyme vinaigrette, piquant and precise.

The menu now includes a few selections you're unlikely to find elsewhere on the Danforth. The Kolokithokefteedes — minced, mildly spiced zucchini patties with potato, onion and parsley, are gently pan-fried to golden crispness. THIS is what GreekTown is all about. The Seafood Souvlaki, its large, marinated chunks of calamari, shrimps and scallops grilled to perfection, harmonizes the separate but distinct flavours of each ingredient.

Traditional items also prove gratifying. The leg of lamb, succulently stuffed with spinach, sautéed onion, pepper and fresh herbs, is noteworthy, as is the vegetarian moussaka — elegantly and precisely layered.

Homemade Greek desserts preserve the afterglow of your fine meal. Galaktoboureko — the Greek version of a custard slice — is just as it should be: the filling silky smooth, the crust shatteringly delicate.

As a licensed caterer, Christina's can also make its excellent fare available for private functions at other venues.

The Vomvolakis siblings acquired Christina's "to recapture the magic". Says Bill — long known to Danforth-goers as the owner of Brass Taps, the area's premier gourmet pizza pub — "Christina's is a landmark on the Danforth. There was just too much good history here to let go." Echoes Kathy, "the area didn't need another good Greek restaurant, but it can always use another great one. We thought, what better way to achieve this than by giving the grand old girl a facelift?"

One visit to the new Christina's is a welcoming affirmation that the old girl ain't what she used to be; she's better.

Like Everyone Else . . . But Different: The Paradoxical Success of Canadian Jews

by Morton Weinfeld

published by McClelland & Stewart

"There should be a book like this for any and all groups that make up Canadian society. Meanwhile, read this one. You will laugh a little, think a lot, and learn why no one will ever write the last word on the Jews of Canada – though Morton Weinfeld comes close." – Desmond Morton

"An outstanding analysis of Canadian Jewish life today, written with verve and humour and accessible to all." – Gerald Tulchinsky

In this fascinating new book, Dr. Morton Weinfeld shows how Canada's Jews have more than prevailed, despite their troubled history, the waves of displaced immigrants, the Holocaust, the continuing pressures of anti-Semitism, assimilation, intermarriage, and secularism. Many experts contend that Jewish life in Canada is facing extinction in the face of these pressures, but Morton Weinfeld argues in this major new book that the Jews of Canada are thriving.

Morton Weinfeld investigates the complex and fascinating story of Jews in Canada today. Using the latest research, he explores their history and diversity, their work lives and family lives, their various communities and religious divisions, their politics and culture. He writes with total command of his subject and with considerable flair. Throughout is the flavour of Jewish daily life, and the pages are peppered with Jewish jokes and revealing anecdotes, many of them drawn from the author's own life.

This absorbing, surprising, and often controversial study is a "must-read" for every Canadian Jew and for anyone connected to or curious about Jewish life and multiculturalism.

Dr. Morton Weinfeld is a professor of sociology and holds the chair in Canadian Ethnic Studies at McGill University. He has been teaching a course on the sociology of Canadian Jewry at McGill since 1977. He is the author of numerous works on modern Jewish studies, history, ethnicity, immigration, and other topics, and writes a monthly column for The Canadian Jewish News. He lives in Montreal.

Two Neptune Drive Welcomes New Residents

Special to the Canadian Jewish News

Life has begun at Two Neptune Drive. It's been only two months since Baycrest Residential Properties opened the doors to this new community of independent seniors. Already, almost 200 people have moved in and now call the building home.

One pair of happy new residents include Betty & Morris Kreidstein. The two made the move to Two Neptune Drive in a leap of faith two years ago when the building "was still a hole in the ground", according to Betty. "We trusted Baycrest to deliver on their promises ... and they have", continues Morris. Now, in their one bedroom plus a den suite, the Kreidsteins have lots of room for visitors, especially their two children Alan & Marla and five grandchildren.

"When we bought we didn't know anybody else who had", admitted Betty. "Since then, we have talked to a number of friends and suggested they join us. It seems many took their advice, as over 100 of the 120 life lease suites have now sold.

"We came to the conclusion that at our age we really needed a place like this", says Betty. Previously, she and her husband had lived for sixteen years in a four bedroom home in Downsview. "We now have everything we need here". This includes: friends, support, security, shopping, synagogues and close proximity to Baycrest Hospital and the Wagman Centre. The Kreidsteins prefer walking to these two Baycrest facilities, while many other residents make use of the free shuttle bus.

The energetic couple also make a daily trip to the workout room and use the machines. "It's like living in a hotel", says Morris a retired upholsterer. "The fitness guy on staff is trying to get more of the residents organized with a program as well." There's also a lovely library built on the second floor to which the Kreidsteins plan on making a donation of books. "Hopefully we can initiate a collection", muses Betty.

The Kreidsteins are also very impressed with the staff at Two Neptune Drive, particularly Danny, the front desk attendant who they see trying to help people out in any way he can. "And, always with a smile" says Morris.

Betty is very practical about their situation: "We know that our kids don't always have time to help us out. That's why a place like this makes so much sense." And, how would the Kreidsteins address any others considering the same move into Two Neptune Drive? "Go for it", they both heartily refrain.

Ovarian cancer's symptoms often mistaken for other ailments

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Social psychologist Freda Ariella Muscovitch, who considers herself very lucky to have survived ovarian cancer, is dismayed at the lack of knowledge about the disease among physicians as well as the general public.

When Muscovitch had trouble digesting her food, both her family doctor and a gastroenterologist decided she had irritable bowel syndrome, and advised her to eat more fibre even when she had blood in her urine.

It wasn't until she was in great pain – "I couldn't sit, because the tumor was pressing on my rectum and bladder" – that she went to an oncologist, who diagnosed ovarian cancer.

Known as the whispering disease because its symptoms are so vague, ovarian cancer is the fifth-leading cause of cancer death among Canadian women. By the time a woman realizes there is something seriously wrong, it is frequently too late to do anything about it.

According to statistics provided by the Toronto-based National Ovarian Cancer Association (NOCA), ovarian cancer strikes some 2,500 women annually in Canada, and 1,500 women die from the disease every year.

Five years after the initial diagnosis, 60 percent will have died.

The symptoms are often mistaken for other ailments, and seem minor. They include abdominal discomfort; pelvic pain; bloating and gas; frequent urination; vaginal bleeding; fatigue and backache; nausea; indigestion and loss of appetite; weight loss; and a change in bowel habits.

Information provided by NOCA advises that anyone with a combination of symptoms persisting longer than three weeks should consult their family doctor.

Researchers believe that five to 10 percent of ovarian cancers may have a hereditary component, linked not just to a family history of ovarian cancer, but to one of breast, endometrial or colorectal cancer as well. Just as with breast cancer, a mutation in the BRCA1 and BRCA2 tumor-suppressing genes – a mutation which occurs most frequently in Jewish Ashkenazi women – appears to make a woman more susceptible.

Other risk factors include a history of infertility, early menstruation, late menopause and age (ovarian cancer is most common in women over 50).

Although researchers are not quite sure why, term pregnancies, breastfeeding and the use of oral contraceptives appear to be preventive factors. Those at high risk may choose to surgically remove the ovaries.

Early detection is vital as survival depends on if, and where, the cancer has spread in the body.

Standard treatment is surgical removal (called debulking) of the cancer, followed by chemotherapy and sometimes radiation.

Muscovitch said support from family and friends also helped her.

"All I wanted to do was to sit in my garden. My friends used to bring me soup to make me feel better," she said.

Her husband and her sons researched the disease and helped her find her oncologist.

Nevertheless, "we as Jewish women have to take responsibility for ourselves," she said. "We have to demand that there be more awareness, more research, just as there was grass roots pressuring about breast cancer and AIDS."

And more funds are needed to fight the disease, she said.

Seniors & Health

• Dr. Shelley Veinish •

Dear Dr. Veinish,

When I see my family doctor I always feel rushed. I never get to ask all the things I want to ask about my health. Before I know it, the checkup is over. I know my doctor is very busy. Do you have any tips for getting the most out of a visit?

Mary

Dear Mary,

Be it a trip to the wilderness or a visit to the doctor – be prepared! A thoughtful list prepared ahead of time can serve not only as a helpful memory aid but as a kind of agenda for you and your doctor. Refer to it when booking the appointment, if possible, so that the secretary or nurse will know how much time to schedule. If your physician is aware of your concerns and questions beforehand, she will also likely be more able to address them in a satisfactory manner.

A word of caution. Listen to the answers. It may be useful to take brief notes. Then you can review them later when you are alone. Your notes will also help you to provide an accurate report to the friends and relatives who ask, "What did the doctor say?"

Don't feel pressured to get through the entire list in a single visit. In fact, review the list with your physician at the beginning, so that you can determine your priorities together and avoid the mutual frustration of recalling "that most important thing" just as you are walking out the door. And remember, you can always schedule another appointment to address any remaining concerns.

Your doctor may also have some questions for you. These will help her to identify a health-care plan suited to your needs. Take the time in advance to describe your concerns and symptoms as clearly as possible in writing, including when they occur, what makes them worse, what makes them better and how they are affecting your life in general.

Other things to bring with you to your appointment include a list of all your current medications, over-the-counter preparations, vitamins, herbal preparations and supplements. It is often helpful to bring all the bottles as well, and the name and number of your pharmacy. Bringing along a relative or friend may also provide you with support, and a much-needed extra set of ears to help you remember after the visit is over.

I hope these tips are a useful guide. May you have a pleasant journey.

Dr. Shelley Veinish is a geriatrician at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and assistant professor in the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto.

Rabbi Eliezer Schach, Torah giant, dies at age 103

By SHAHAR ILAN
Ha'aretz daily Newspaper Ltd.

Obituary

BNEI BRAK — Rabbi Eliezer Menachem Schach, the leader of Degel Hatorah, the "Lithuanian" haredi faction, died early Friday morning at Tel Hashomer Hospital at the age of 103.

Rabbi Schach was admitted to the hospital in critical condition on Wednesday afternoon due to respiratory failure. On Thursday night, his condition deteriorated, and he died at about 2 a.m. At his bedside were his son, Dr. Ephraim Schach, his daughter Dvora Bergman, her husband Rabbi Meir Zvi Bergman and others.

Following the official announcement, many haredim tore their clothes as a sign of mourning, while at the Ponevezh Yeshiva, which Rabbi Schach headed, many students sat on the floor in mourning and wept. Hundreds of thousands of members of the haredi community from throughout the country made their way to Bnei Brak for the funeral last Friday.

Rabbi Schach was born on Jan. 22, 1898, in the remote village of Wabolnick in northern Lithuania, presumably the fourth child of Azriel and Batsheva Schach. He came from a family of merchants who had been involved in commerce for generations.

When Eliezer Menachem was seven, the local teacher informed his parents that the boy was a genius and was wasting his time under his tutelage. He was sent to the beit midrash in Ponevezh, where he lived in the home of a wealthy local Jew. There was little contact with his family apart from letters.

By the time he was 13, it was obvious that the young student had outgrown Ponevezh, too. He was sent to the Knesset Yisrael yeshiva in Slobodka, where he soon caught the eye of the head of the yeshiva, Rabbi Isser Zalman Meltzer. When Rabbi Meltzer left to establish a new yeshiva in Slutsk, Eliezer Menachem was one of a select group who went with him. They lived in poverty; Eliezer Menachem had only one suit of clothing. On Thursdays, when he washed his white shirt for the Sabbath, he was forced to remain shirtless in the cold until it dried.

Rabbi Meltzer became Eliezer Menachem's patron, and even arranged a match with his niece, Guttel, from the village of Mir. Guttel had begun to study medicine in Moscow, but dropped out to care for her sick mother, who wanted her to marry a scholar. Guttel told her uncle, Rabbi Meltzer, that she would settle for nothing less than his top student. And so she married Eliezer Menachem Schach.

Their three children – Miriam Raisel, Devorah and Ephraim – were born in Kletsk, Lithuania, in the early 1920s. Rabbi Schach taught at the yeshiva of Rabbi Aharon Kotler, and Guttel supported the family by working as the assistant of a non-Jewish doctor. Rabbi Schach found his first job as a yeshiva head at the Luninets yeshiva of the Karlin Hasidim. During that period, he was away from his family for weeks at a time.

Rabbi Eliezer Schach

In 1939, the eldest daughter, Miriam Raisel, died of pneumonia. She was 14 years old. On her deathbed, her father promised her that they would meet again. During World War II, Rabbi Aharon Kotler and his students packed their bags and set off for the United States, which they eventually reached by way of Shanghai. Rabbi Schach chose to go to Palestine.

The first yeshiva he headed in this country was Hayishuv Hahadash, affiliated with the national religious camp. After that, he was head of the Kletsk yeshiva in Rechovot. Over the years, both institutions became yeshiva high schools. In the 1940s, a few years after the establishment of the Ponevezh yeshiva in Bnei Brak, he was asked to be one of its heads – a position he has held until his death.

No one seems to know exactly when Rabbi Schach was appointed to the Council of Torah Sages. Former deputy minister Menachem Porush believes it was sometime around the establishment of the Jewish State. Twenty years later, when Rabbi Zalman Sorotzkin died, Rabbi Schach became president. Membership in the Council of Torah Sages was rare for Lithuanian rabbis; it was considered too lowly for them. Thus one might say that Rabbi Schach achieved his unique standing despite being a member of the Council of Torah Sages.

Rabbi Schach's wife Guttel died in 1969, as a result of complications from diabetes. His son Ephraim joined the national religious camp. He holds a doctorate in philosophy and works as a supervisor for the Ministry of Education. Ephraim's children, Amalia and Doron, lead secular lives. Doron was a paratrooper in the IDF. After that, he worked as an undercover agent for the police, setting traps for drug dealers.

Rabbi Schach's daughter, Devorah, married a Torah scholar named Rabbi Meir Zvi Bergman. When Devorah fell ill and became bedridden for long periods of time, Rabbi Schach played a major role in the upbringing and education of the children.

Terrorist kills two in Jerusalem

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A terror attack took place here Sunday, as Israel was planning a troop withdrawal from a Palestinian-controlled city in the West Bank.

During the afternoon rush hour, a Palestinian gunman opened fire on a bus in the French Hill neighbourhood in northern Jerusalem.

Two people were killed and dozens of others injured when the gunman sprayed the No. 25 Egged bus with fire from an M-16 automatic rifle.

Police identified one of the dead as Shoshana Ben Yishai, a 16-year-old who immigrated to Israel with her parents from Long Island when she was five years old.

Three Israelis – a border police officer, a soldier and a civilian – shot and killed the gunman during the attack.

The gunman was a member of Islamic Jihad from the West Bank city of Hebron, Jerusalem police chief Mickey Levy said.

The attack came just hours after Defence Minister Benjamin Ben- Eliezer had said at Israel's weekly cabinet meeting that Israeli troops would soon withdraw from the West Bank city of Kalkilya.

After the attack, Ben-Eliezer said the withdrawal would soon proceed as planned.

Dogged Belgian pursuit of Sharon stuns Israeli officials

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The case should have been wrapped up without a hitch.

Michele Hirsch, the attorney Israel hired to contest Belgium's case against Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, submitted a series of substantive arguments to the investigating judge who is taking care of the case. The defence: the case against Sharon lacks merit, and a Belgian court doesn't have the jurisdiction to hear it. The judge accepted the argument, ruled that he wasn't authorized to take the file, and passed the matter to a higher court. Likewise, the Belgian prosecutors redirected their findings and claims to the higher court.

Then came the snag.

Hirsch and the officials from the justice and foreign ministries, who are in Belgium, were convinced that Belgian prosecutors would agree with the Israeli recommendation that the file be shut once and for all. This turned out to be wishful thinking.

"Up to a month ago we were very optimistic," says a senior Israeli official. "And then, suddenly and in a very ugly fashion, [the Belgians] turned 180 degrees in the other direction."

Sharon's Belgian saga began last June. A 1993 Belgian law empowers local courts to judge people suspected of war crimes, with no regard to their citizenship or where the alleged crimes were committed.

In a test of the law, four defendants stood trial in Brussels for genocide in Rwanda. It was a trial watched keenly by observers around the world, and in its wake, Kurds brought charges against Saddam Hussein's Iraqi regime to courts in Brussels, and Palestinians followed suit with charges against Sharon and three other Israelis – Rafael Eitan, Amir Drori and Amos Yaron – concerning the 1982 massacre of an estimated 800 Palestinians at Sabra and Chatila refugee camps in Lebanon.

The case against Sharon in the Belgian courts contains nothing new about Sabra and Chatila. It quotes from the 1983 Kahan Commission report and other published sources, including Sharon's own autobiography.

The Sharon file was given to investigating judge Patrick Collignon, who had to decide if it had sufficient grounds for indictment.

"I've waited for this day for years," said Suad Srour, a survivor of the massacre from Beirut, who travelled to Brussels to lodge the accusations against Sharon.

While local officials in Brussels doubted the case would make any headway, Israeli officials were fearful of being caught napping. Taking no chances, they retained Hirsch, a Jewish-Belgian attorney who had represented the victims in the Rwanda trial.

Within two weeks, she submitted the defence to Collignon in Israel's name (not Sharon's), relaying a series of arguments denying the Belgian court's authority to preside over the case. Hirsch appealed to Sharon's presumed immunity as a serving prime minister, to Belgium's lack of connection to Sabra and Chatila, to the fact that Israel had already "judged" Sharon in the Kahan Commission, and to the implausible retroactive nature of the claim (the massacre in Lebanon was 11 years before Belgium enacted the 1993 war crimes law).

Israeli officials breathed a deep sigh of relief when Collignon and the prosecutors agreed to relay the relevant evidence and arguments to a higher court. They viewed this passing of the file as a sign that the higher court would confirm the basic defence point – Belgium lacks authority to put Sharon on trial for events in Lebanon two decades ago.

The decision by Collignon and the prosecutors to refer the case to another court surprised the Palestinian plaintiffs, and the Belgian media reported it as a triumph for Israel. The apparent waffling was taken as a sign that Belgium's legal system was having second thoughts about the sweep of the 1993 law.

Indeed, as the case was being referred to the higher court, Belgium's attorney general publicly commented that the war crimes law "should be restricted" to give immunity to world leaders, and prosecutors should be required to show that a particular case had a "direct connection" with Belgium.

Then came the blow.

Belgian prosecutors announced in early October that they rejected Israel's arguments. The case would resume.

The announcement shocked Israel's embassy in Belgium.

"We had the feeling the Belgian prosecutors had accepted our contentions," said a senior Israeli official. "We were sure that our gamble on Hirsch was correct, and that her line of defence was on target... And then, suddenly, two or three weeks ago it became evident they had changed their minds, and [the state prosecutors] would recommend that the higher court has authority" to hear the case.

Israeli officials point their fingers at the Belgians, hinting of a double-cross.

"They did everything they could through a number of channels to make us believe" the case would be closed, says one high-ranking Israeli official.

Angered by the turn of events, Israeli officials have now changed their defence philosophy. From now on they will proceed on the assumption that "Belgian state prosecutors are against us."

One Israeli official says the Belgians shifted gears on the case after the attacks on the United States on Sept. 11, when Belgian officials became worried about angry or militant Islamic responses if they shut the book on Sharon and the Sabra and Chatila case.

Another Israeli official believes Belgium is not diplomatically ready at this stage to reach a conclusion on the Sharon case. In this view, Belgium is playing for time, trying to defer a decision on the case until it ends its term as European Union President in the six-monthly rotation.

In any case, Israeli officials think they have a whiff of something rotten in Brussels, possibly coming from political interference in the court system's handling of the Sharon file. In a complaint about the Belgian legal system's handling of the file, Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein sent a sharp letter last week to his Belgian counterpart.

Rubinstein hinted that political, diplomatic or other non-legal considerations might have influenced the Belgian decision to proceed with the case. He repeated the argument that there is no logic to putting Sharon on trial since the Kahan Commission had thoroughly assessed the allegations concerning his connection to the massacre.

Manley tours Middle East

CJN Wire Services

JERUSALEM — Canada's foreign minister, John Manley, tried to persuade Israel to withdraw from Palestinian areas last week, but was politely rebuffed by Israeli authorities.

Later he met with Yasser Arafat and urged the Palestinian leader to renounce violence and get back to peace negotiations. He also affirmed Canada's support for the creation of a Palestinian state.

In talks last Wednesday with Israeli leaders, including President Moshe Katsav and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Manley, on a five-day Mideast swing that began with controversy, made Canada's case as best he could.

The minister urged Israel to release its grip on four Palestinian towns and withdraw altogether from the West Bank.

Reports differed on just how forcefully those entreaties were presented. One Canadian newspaper said Manley urged Sharon and the Israeli foreign minister, Shimon Peres, to pull out from Palestinian territory "immediately." Another paper said a Sharon spokesperson played down the way the issue was raised in talks between the two. "[Manley] asked, he didn't say," said Ranaan Gissin. "He asked, 'When are you going?' And [Sharon] said, 'As soon as possible.'"

In any event, it was clear Manley was turned down.

"They are not going to phone Ottawa before they act, that is clear," he told a news conference. "But it's important that they understand our position, even if they don't accept it."

In Gaza City where he met with Arafat, Manley told reporters that Israel's security concerns must be addressed, "but at the same time, we need to resolve some of these long-standing issues – in this case, a just result for Palestinian people, the creation of a Palestinian state."

The foreign minister also told reporters he urged Arafat to renounce violence and "help rebuild the constituency for peace that needs to be there in Israel. You should not think anyone is going to be able to impose a settlement against the will of the Israeli people."

Manley's visit coincided with meetings in Jerusalem of the World Jewish Congress, attended by more than 50 Canadians, including Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, and former president Moshe Ronen.

While conceding that talks may be "frustrating" at times, Manley stressed that they must go on.

"There is no doubt I have followed a succession of foreign ministers and some heads of government. But I don't think it is wasted time for the world community to repeat messages," he said.

In his account of the meeting with Sharon, Manley said the Israeli prime minister "pounced" on the question of Israel's incursion into Palestinian territory when it was raised, insisting that Israel has no interest in staying there for long.

"It's not necessary that [Sharon] act immediately for us to know our views have been heard. We're not in a position to make demands of anybody."

In a joint briefing to reporters a day earlier, Peres praised Canada as "both friendly and objective. It's always worthwhile to have a fresh view and penetrating eye to see what's happening. We received [Manley] here as a friend, representing a country that is trying to do its best in order to bring peace as soon as possible to our midst. I think our talks were useful, informative, and we shall continue in the future."

Asked whether Canada regards Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad as terrorist groups, Manley said, "We think that the use of violence in order to achieve political objectives, particularly against civilian populations, is unacceptable, and the victims of that violence are equally victimized no matter who is the perpetrator."

Asked whether that definition applies to Israeli actions, Manley demurred. "I'm not here to try to give definitions to a word. We have a situation here which is complex and difficult and where there's plenty of blame to be shared. But the solution is not to try to apportion or allocate blame. The solution is to encourage a reduction of the violence, a cooling-off period, and a process of confidence building, which is what the Mitchell committee recommended."

'World community repeats messages'

Manley found himself fending off questions about a remark he'd made prior to leaving for the trip. "Whatever you might say about Sept. 11," he said in Ottawa, "I'm not aware that it was a claim for some kind of territory on Manhattan Island. These are very different situations."

In Israel, Manley appeared to backpedal: "From the point of view of victims, terrorism is terrorism," he said.

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) said it was "appalled" by his original comment, which is an "alarming and totally unacceptable espousal of Canadian Middle East policy." CJC called the statement "most unfortunate and indeed dangerous for peace and security in the Middle East."

CIC moderated its critique at the conclusion of Manley's visit, saying it was satisfied overall with his Mideast tour.

"Mr. Manley's recognition of the constant threat of violence experienced by Israelis at the hands of Palestinian rejectionists is most welcome, as was his acknowledgment of Israel's right and obligation to take the necessary security measures to protect the safety of her citizens," said CIC chair Joseph Wilder.

"Equally important," Wilder continued, "was his call on Chairman Arafat and the Palestinian Authority [PA] to support their words with measurable steps to reduce the threat of terrorism, including the re-apprehension and incarceration of over 100 known and convicted Palestinian terrorists released by the PA over the last year, and an end to the PA orchestrated anti-Israel incitement."

Manley described his meetings earlier in the week with Syrian officials, including President Bashar al-Assad, as unsatisfying. "They were not able to give me a satisfactory response on [Israeli soldiers listed as] missing in action. They did not take any responsibility for any groups that use violence in order to achieve political objectives, and from that point of view, it was not a satisfactory meeting."

The Week in Israel

Oct. 29

• An Israel Defence Forces spokesperson said there is a "high probability" that Benny Avraham, Adi Avitan and Omar Souad, the three soldiers kidnapped by Hezbollah a year ago, are dead. Later in the week, they were officially declared dead.

Oct. 30

• Israeli Arabs clashed with police in northern Israel. More than 30 Arabs, including three Arab members of the Knesset were wounded near the town of Tira. The protesters were demonstrating against the expropriation of property for the construction of the Trans-Israel Highway in the area.

Oct. 31

• The IDF killed Jamal Jadallah, a Hamas military commander in Hebron. The IDF said Jadallah was involved in the June 1 bombing of the Dolphinarium discotheque in Tel Aviv.

• World Jewish Congress president Edgar Bronfman called on Israel to dismantle some settlements. Addressing the WJC meeting, Bronfman said settlements in the West Bank that cannot be defended should be abandoned. He also said Israel's presence in Gaza is a mistake.

Nov. 1

• The IDF killed two activists from the militant Hamas movement and abducted two others in separate operations in the West Bank.

• The residence of Israel's President Moshe Katsav was evacuated due to an anthrax "scare." An envelope was received containing white powder.

Nov. 2

• Almost two percent of Israeli jobs have been lost because of the slump in tourism. Tourism to Israel has dropped by 50 percent in the first seven months of the year.

Files from JTA & Ha'aretz

Different standards for Israel

The desperation of the United States and its allies to curry favour with terrorist-sponsoring states like Syria and Iran in order to build an Arab/Muslim-based "anti-terrorist" coalition has led some of the media to view Israel as an impediment to this coalition. And so we find renewed attempts to focus negative attention on Israel's struggle against unremitting Palestinian violence. Palestinian terrorism is recast as "resistance to occupation" or, after Israel's incursion into Palestinian towns to stop the violence that Arafat won't, as "resistance to re-occupation."

According to Reports

The terrorism that Israel suffers from is accordingly viewed as qualitatively different from the horrific events which befell the United States on Sept. 11. Those who promote such views either forget or are oblivious to the fact that groups like the PFLP, Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah – which are sponsored by Iran, Syria and some of which receive funding from Saudi Arabia – are not interested in Israel-Palestinian reconciliation. They want Israel destroyed. They see the sovereign presence of Jews in any part of "historic Palestine" as an "occupation" that must be eliminated.

It is depressing to acknowledge, but the evidence is too overwhelming to ignore, that this rejectionist ideology extends beyond these groups. It pervades major elements of Arafat's own Fatah, and indeed reaches to Arafat himself.

Terrorists want Israel destroyed

Contrary to UN Resolutions 242 and 338 which call for negotiations, contrary to the Mitchell Commission which calls for an unconditional and immediate end to violence, and contrary to his own written commitments in the Oslo accords and subsequent agreements renouncing violence, Arafat encourages the continuation of violence. We must not forget that Arafat passed up the chance to achieve statehood through negotiations at Camp David and Taba. So the current talk in some media circles defending the Palestinians' "resistance to occupation" is hollow and disingenuous.

It is especially depressing that the question of whether Arafat "really" recognizes Israel keeps being asked, and even more depressing that most of the Israeli peace camp can't answer in the affirmative. Arafat refuses to arrest known terrorists, to disarm militants and to stop anti-Israel incitement. So, as Shimon Peres has argued, Israel has no choice but to go after the perpetrators of violence. Yet the country ends up being challenged by those who cast doubt on its claim of acting in self-defence.

The choice for Israel, as the late PLO expert Yehoshafat Harkabi noted, is all too often between bad and worse. Arafat is untrustworthy but if Israel doesn't deal with him it faces even worse prospects; if Israel takes measures – tepid by U.S. military actions today – to deal with violence it is damned; but if it does nothing that's even worse.

Singer goes back to her Mississipi roots 'n' blues

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Nanette Workman's rich, powerful voice has taken her far from her home in Jackson, Miss., where the singer grew up during the civil rights era.

The Workman family were members of Jackson's Temple Beth Israel, which was bombed by the Ku Klux Klan in 1966, the same year Workman, then 19, left for New York to understudy the leading lady in the musical How To Succeed In Business Without Really Trying.

A few months later, she moved on to Montreal. Workman, who is virtually unknown in English Canada but has been a star in Quebec for nearly 35 years, shot to the top of Quebec's flourishing music scene with her first French single, Et Maintenant, which held the No. 1 spot on the charts for 15 weeks.

She now has more than 20 English and French recordings, in various musical styles, to her credit.

Workman's latest critically acclaimed recording, Roots 'N' Blues, features blues and rhythm and blues, the music that she heard on the radio while she was growing up in Mississippi. The woman who was known in Jackson as the cute little girl with a voice like Ethel Merman makes her Ontario debut Nov. 24 as part of the Toronto Blues Society's Women's Blues Revue at the Music Hail on Danforth Avenue.

Raised in South Jackson, away from the Jewish community in North Jackson, Workman was the only Jew in a school of 1,200 kids.

"I never felt any prejudice toward me personally, but there was a prejudice, as there was toward the blacks," she says.

Workman's family – her mother, Beatryce, her late father, Ernest, a convert, and her younger brother, Billy – was active at Temple Beth Israel on Old Clanton Road. Workman sang in the choir, which earned her a scholarship to the University of Mississippi.

The temple, destroyed by the Klan, was rebuilt in 1967, its stones, according to temple literature, bearing witness "to the turmoil of the civil rights era."

Music runs in Workman's family. Her mother and father met during a U.S. tour of a New York City Opera Company production of Naughty Marietta. Her mother, then 19, sang in the chorus and her father played the trumpet. "We were married 54 years and everyone told us it would never last because he wasn't Jewish and he was 12 years older than me," says Beatryce Workman, 77, who is still active at Temple Beth Israel.

Coming from a musical family, it's not surprising that Nanette received a good music education. She learned to play piano and violin and to read and write music, and she acquired a background in classical music. "I stopped playing the violin in high school because it was no longer 'cool,'" she says. "The guitar had replaced the violin."

She's grateful that her parents insisted that she study music, which she says opened doors for her later in life. Workman sang backup on the Rolling Stones' classic 1969 album Let It Bleed and the Stones' 1981 record Tattoo You, as well as on recordings by John Lennon, Ringo Starr and George Harrison.

She was hired as a backing vocalist, she says, because not only could she sing, but she was also able to sight-read music. "I also gained the respect of musicians that I worked with because of my education in music."

Workman is a songwriter as well as a singer. She was involved in writing some of the songs on her new CD and has written tunes for her many previous recordings.

During her lengthy career, she has sung jazz, pop, disco, heavy metal and operetta. "All of the songs I've done were an expression of who I was at the time," she says. "Why limit yourself? Why not touch on everything? We're changing people – we don't stay the same all our lives – so why not change music?"

Workman has also toured with French superstar Johnny Hallyday as his opening act, starred in two French rock musicals and, as an actor, eventually spread her wings into television and film. She was inducted into the Mississippi Musicians Hall of Fame in April 2000.

She hasn't ventured into English Canada before this year because she was content working exclusively in Quebec. "Everything was going so well here," she says, adding that she's not a driven person.

But with Workman's highly rated new CD going out to radio stations across the country, English Canada will likely be hearing more of her in the future.

THE PRINCESS OF WALES THEATRE
A GALA FILM EVENT

Tuesday, November 13, 2001

Sole survivor to attend screening.

With his new film The Struma writer/director Simcha Jacobovici tells the story of 779 Jewish refugees who fled Romania in 1941, aboard a dilapidated vessel called the Struma. Bound for Palestine, the over-crowded ship suffered engine failure and barely made it to Istanbul. Under pressure from Great Britain, Turkey refused the passengers sanctuary. For 71 days the Struma's fate was deliberated at the highest levels. Then, as desperate cries echoed from its hull, the Struma was towed out to sea and left to drift aimlessly.

On February 24, 1942 an explosion rang over the frigid waters of the Black Sea. Almost 800 men, women and children perished. Only one survived. He will be attending the gala screening of The Struma at The Princess of Wales Theatre on the evening of November 13, 2001.

Using groundbreaking research and never before seen archival footage, The Struma not only unravels the mystery surrounding the tragedy, it serves to honour the dead and inspire the living. In spine-tingling detail, the one surviving passenger, David Stoliar, recounts his memories of the disaster. In addition, the film chronicles the recent diving expedition in search of the wreck. The dive was led by Greg Buxton, a man whose grandparents went down with the vessel. Greg Buxton will also be at The Princess of Wales Theatre on November 13, 2001.

The Struma is a story that has never been told. And as Jacobovici maintains, it is a "story that no one believed could be told". Simcha Jacobovici invites you to be at The Princess of Wales Theatre on November 13, 2001 - an evening you'll never forget!

The Princess of Wales Theatre - 300 King Street West,
6:00PM Reception, 7:30PM Film Screening, 9:30PM Patron reception at the CBC's Barbara Frum Atrium, Tickets: $54, Tax-deductible patron tickets: $180

Cinematheque Ontario presents Amos Gitai retrospective

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Amos Gitai has shot to prominence as one of Israel's finest, most prolific filmmakers.

Although his films are not always readily accessible to mainstream audiences, say this for them: they are invariably edgy and inconoclastic, challenging the dogmas of the day.

Whether he is churning out documentaries or features, Gitai brings to his craft a kind of uncompromising intellectual rigour and bleak honesty relatively rare in the movie business.

Not all his films, however, succeed. Eden, his latest, which premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival in September, falls more or less flat.

But along with failures come successes: Kippur, which paints a sombre picture of war, and Kadosh, which presents Jerusalem's haredi community in a totally unfamiliar light.

On Nov. 17, Cinematheque Ontario kicks off an Amos Gitai retrospective. All screenings are in Jackman Hall, Art Gallery of Ontario.

Herewith is a sampler, a taste of Gitai's style and sensibility:

The Wadi series, a trilogy unfolding at ten-year intervals since 1981, tells the story of Jewish and Arab squatters in an abandoned and squalid quarry on the eastern outskirts of Haifa.

Living on the periphery of Israeli society, they don't quite fit in or, in the case of Israeli Arabs, they were driven from their original homes and land.

Two Holocaust survivors, one of whom rejects German reparation payments on principle and considers himself an idealist for having settled in Israel, appear on screen first. Their reminiscences about the war are chilling, but hardly poignant or memorable.

Miriam, a Jewish woman from Hungary, is far more interesting as a person. She defied convention by marrying an Israeli Arab, a fisherman who claims he feels closer to Jews than Arabs.

An avid gardener who has been scarred by life, she exudes common sense and humanity, lending Wadi poetic resonance.

Apart from Miriam, we're introduced to Yussuf, an Arab labourer who collects scrap to supplement his meagre income; Yussuf's wife, who recalls an era before Israeli statehood when Jews and Arabs supposedly lived in harmony; Omar and Yelena, a young, mixed Arab-Jewish couple who eke out an existence in the ruins of a forlorn building, and a 70-year-old Russian man, a loner who's sorry he immigrated to Israel.

In fleshing out his portraits of Israelis on the margins, Gitai eschews voice-over narration, letting his characters speak for themselves. There is merit in the method, but it also sows some confusion.

Adapted from Past Continuous, Yaakov Shabtai's novel, Devarim (Things) revolves around three disillusioned Israeli men who seek meaning in their lives.

Cesar (Assi Dayan) is a divorced photographer who's jealous of his ex-wife, worried sick by his son's untimely illness and torn between two women he genuinely likes.

Cesar's roommate, Israel (Amos Shub), a much younger man with no apparent job, is jolted by the discovery that his girlfriend is pregnant.

Goldman (Amos Gitai), a lawyer living with his parents, dreams of love, but wallows in the nihilistic belief that suicide is the highest form of freedom.

Devarim, made in 1995, opens as Cesar and Israel search in vain for the cemetery where Goldman's unlamented father is to be buried.

Unable to find it, they turn up at Goldman's house, where a discussion of the dollar value of his valuable stamp collection is under way.

A dissection of angst in secular, middle-class Israel, the film twists and turns in sometimes surprising directions as the characters collide.

Filmed on the eve of the 1982 war in Lebanon, Field Diary consists of vignettes of Israel's occupation of the territories, usually from the vantage point of Gitai's open car window.

Stripped to its bare essentials, Field Diary is basically an impressionistic, though occasionally disjointed, look at Israel's controversial presence in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

No admirer of Israeli settlements beyond the Green Line, Gitai photographs soldiers on patrol and in repose, Jewish men and women surveying land for their homes-to-be and a Palestinian Arab deeply attached to his olive grove.

He also stakes out an Israeli peace delegation visiting the mayor of an Arab town whose legs were blown away in a Jewish terrorist attack.

Field Diary, which unfolds against the backdrop of Palestinian resistance to the occupation, is at its most animated when Gitai engages Israeli soldiers in casual conversation.

Some believe that the West Bank belongs to the Jewish people. Still others contend that it should be used as a bargaining chip in future peace talks with the Palestinians.

Perhaps the most moving segment shows Palestinian women protesting the uprooting of an olive grove to make way for a new Jewish settlement.

In the main, Field Diary is deliberately bland, but its blandness is quite deceptive. Gitai's left-of-centre sympathies are never far from the surface.

On Nov. 18, in an event sponsored by the Toronto International Film Festival, Gitai and Canadian director Atom Egoyan will discuss Gitai's movies. The conversation, free to the public, will be held at Jackman Hall from 7 pm to 8 pm. For info. c all 416-934-3257.

Author Elaine Denholtz drawn to story of boy's kidnapping

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Elaine Denholtz, author of seven non-fiction books, says she worked far longer on her latest book, The Zaddik: The Battle for a Boy's Soul, than on any previous work because she found the story so riveting and complicated.

The New Jersey author spent six years working on the book, which recounts the true story of a 13-year-old boy in New York who was kidnapped by chasidic Jews in 1992.

Scheduled to appear this week at the Jewish Book Fair in Toronto, Denholtz says it was her intense sense of identification with the boy's mother that compelled her to tell the story of his kidnapping and the eventual court case that generated headlines from the United States to Israel.

"The reason I got so involved in the story is that – and it seems so tragic given what happened on Sept. 11 – it seemed to ask some very important questions, such as: Where does religious devotion end and evil begin? Why do some people who are ultra-religious fundamentalists think they are above the law?"

In essence, The Zaddik recounts the story of Hana Fhima, a single mother with a secular outlook, and her son Shai Fhima, who became drawn towards Jewish Orthodoxy and a charismatic rabbi at a Brooklyn yeshiva. "I see a light in your eyes, come sit by me," the rabbi reportedly said to Shai, who shortly therafter undergoes a spiritual conversion.

The mother agrees to the rabbi's and rebbetzin's kind offer to make the boy a bar-mitzvah, but soon finds herself in a fierce tug-of-war battle for him. Before long, he is spirited away from her.

Drawn into the chassidic world of black hats, forelock curls and religious devotion, Shai is hidden in a variety of locations in the United States, Canada and France. (Denholtz never discovered his exact whereabouts in Canada.)

To Denholtz, the "fanatical" ultra-Orthodox Jews who kidnapped Shai practiced a form of brain-washing and mind-control on him. "I believe they are cultists, and I will be talking about this when I come to Toronto," she said.

"They simply felt that they had a right to take this child, and that it was in fact a mitzvah to turn him into a zaddik." In Jewish theology, a zaddik is a righteous, upright holy man whose influence helps to save the world from sinking into corruption.

Part of the reason the court case proved so challenging is because the district attorneys had political aspirations and did not want to lose the Jewish religious vote in the New York area, Denholtz said.

Eventually the rabbi was imprisoned and the boy was returned to his parents, splitting his time between his mother in New York and his father in Israel.

Denholtz says she is naturally attracted to controversial issues. Her last book was Balancing Work and Love, which focused on the situation of Jewish working women. She is also a playwright and filmmaker whose credits include the influential documentary film Summerhill.

She is scheduled to appear at Leah Posluns Theatre on Nov. 7, 8 p.m. Admission is $5.

SHERMAN, REDHILL, MANGUEL AMONG CANADA COUNCIL NOMINEES

Toronto playwrights Michael Redhill and Jason Sherman are both contenders for a Governor General's literary award for drama.

Redhill has won acclaim for Building Jerusalem. Set on New Year's Eve 1899, the play focuses on four luminaries forced to spend the evening together. Sherman was nominated for An Acre of Time, a play inspired by Phil Jenkins's book of the same name about a surveying team that uncovers 100 years of history on an acre of land near the Ottawa River.

Alberto Manguel was nominated in the non-fiction category for Reading Pictures: A History of Love and Hate. In the book Manguel, with characteristic insight, guides readers through the many worlds of artistic imagination.

The Canada Council for the Arts is scheduled to announce the winners and present the awards Nov. 14 in Ottawa.

Soprano Sings Sophisticated Soul: Antiguan-born Canadian soprano Denise Williams sings art songs and spirituals accompanied by bass-baritone Marcus Nance and pianist Brahm Goldhamer.

The program includes works by Srul Irving Glick and Nathaniel Dett as well as selections from Kurt Weill's Lost in the Stars and Gershwin's Porgy and Bess.

Williams is a former soloist with the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir. She and Nance earn many standing ovations and CBC radio personality Andy Barrie once said their rendition of Bess You Is My Woman Now "was to die for."

"All the selections are based on the Afrocentric experience, whatever the composers' origin," said Williams. "I have always loved singing this music, and it reflects my soul as an artist and a human being."

Hart House Benefit: The Hart House Theatre, on the U of T campus, is a distinguished 82-year-old dowager that the Oxford Companion to the Theatre describes as "one of the finest little theatres on the North American continent."

The careers of many celebrated theatrical artists have been launched in this special 454-seat theatre. They include Dora Mavor Moore, Wayne & Shuster, Charmion King, Kate Reid, Arthur Hiller, Donald Sutherland and Lorne Michaels. In 1920 W. B. Yeats called it "a theatre for the people."

Last year Hart House Theatre was threatened with closure. Sad to say, the old gal may be doomed unless her friends can raise a $7-million endowment fund over the next three years to ensure her future into perpetuity.

Numerous performers are slated to appear in Been Staged, a fund-raising gala evening of playful nostalgia. Dinah Christie, Chancellor Hal Jackman, Hart Pomerantz, Bob Rae, and Dave Broadfoot are among many scheduled to perform original songs, sketches and stand-up routines.

Others, such as Don Harron and William Hutt, will appear by video. Been Staged also showcases a variety of student talent, including excerpts from The Music Man, Pagan Love Songs for the Uninitiated, and the U of T's very own Skule Night.

A benefactor ticket ($1,000) includes preferred seating, a post-performance reception, plaque privileges, and a tax receipt for $950. A gala ticket ($150) includes the reception and a $100 tax receipt. Some $50 tickets are also available.

Hart House Theatre: The Alum Gala, Nov. 9, 8 p.m. Box office, (416) 978-8668.
